THC Designates 1982 Preservation Grants

After several months delay at the federal level, Texas has been allocated $427,782 as this state's share of the 1982 National Historic Preservation Fund. From that figure the Texas Historical Commission has designated $80,000 for the following 1982 preservation projects:

SURVEYS

Dallas County (Phase II) – $3,000
Fredericksburg – $2,500
Tarrant County – $25,000

PLANNING

Ft. Martin Scott (Gillespie County) – $2,500
Eddleman-McFarland House (Tarrant County) – $7,500
Jefferson County Courthouse – $27,000
Robinson-Rosner Building (Travis County) – $5,000
Kell House (Wichita County) – $7,500

While 1982 projects are progressing, the 1983 Preservation Fund is feeling the pressure of the prolonged federal budget debates in Washington and around the nation.

In February Secretary of the Interior James Watt proposed zero funding for 1983, meaning no money for state programs or the National Trust for Historic Preservation, the first zero funding level in 15 years. Watt contends that the Reagan administration is supporting preservation through the tax act incentives, and that additional federal funding is unnecessary.

The National Historic Preservation Fund has been repeatedly reduced since the 1979 high of $50 million, with the current 1982 national figure at some $25.4 million. Responding to this federal trend, the State of Texas established a state preservation grants program in 1981-82, making $250,000 available each year of the biennium for qualified preservation projects.

But many state and national preservation groups are concerned about the decline in federal support for heritage conservation. The National Trust, which faces cutbacks of up to 50% in some of its services if zero funding is implemented, has launched a major lobbying effort to convince legislators of the economy of preservation.

National Trust President Michael Ainslie is leading the effort to persuade Congress and the administration to fund preservation. "The President and Secretary Watt at Interior, much to their credit, supported and helped us pass as part of the Economic Recovery Act last year the most important new incentives for preservation we have ever seen in this country, namely a 25% investment tax credit for certified rehabilitation," said Ainslie. "That tax feature has stirred interest at all levels. But to get that tax advantage, a developer has to restore the exterior of a building in accordance with guidelines put forth by the Secretary of Interior. Without the grants to states to review plans for developers for certified rehabilitations, there will be chaos. . . . There's no logic in having tax incentives unless they can be implemented. . . . It's ironic because preservation is probably one of the best examples of the public-private approach that President Reagan espouses," Ainslie continued. "We have the private sector doing most of the investment in historic preservation with very little investment by the Government at any level. And we have states carrying out designated responsibilities. Unfortunately, the President and Secretary Watt have proposed to end that funding to the states on the premise that the states will do it all themselves. We're quite confident that most states will be unable to do it alone."

The National Governors' Association and the National Council of Mayors have also endorsed a federally-funded historic preservation program, with roles and responsibilities for all participating local governmental entities.

This wide grass roots support for preservation and the program's proven effectiveness for stimulating private sector investment and economic revitalization is apparently being noticed on Capitol Hill. The U.S. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee has recommended a 1983 Preservation Fund of $25.4 million, the same level as 1982. In the House of Representatives, the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee has proposed no less than $30 million. And the National Park Service has prepared capability studies for funding up to $40 million, suggesting that the local demand for these services exists nationwide.

As the Senate and House approach final federal budget figures, the voice of the public will strongly influence the direction of America's preservation movement.

Fort Worth's Eddleman-McFarland House received a $7,500 planning grant from the Texas Historical Commission.

AT LONG LAST, A LOOK INSIDE McFARLAND HOUSE

The Junior League's purchase of the Eddleman-McFarland House allows curious folks a look inside the Victorian structure when it is opened as a museum June 1.

By CAROL NUCKOLS
Star-Telegram Writer

Before Carrie McFarland died in 1978 at age 100 she was protective of the house she had inhabited for 75 years. Curiosity seekers were turned away; no gawkers were allowed to traipse through the impressive Victorian structure at 1110 Penn.

Now all those who have wondered, "What does that house look like on the inside?" will have their question answered. The Junior League of Fort Worth Inc. has purchased the house, fixed it up so that it sparkles and shines and made plans to open the lower floor as a museum June 1. It is the league's gift to Fort Worth on the occasion of the local organization's 50th birthday.

According to the league's intent, guided tours through the house should take visitors back through time — to the turn of the century, when wealthy cattle barons composed the upper crust of society in what shortly before had been a frontier town. The row of magnificent homes on what later was called "Quality Hill," on the bluff overlooking the Trinity River, perched on the outskirts of a burgeoning city.

Conlee Inc., general contractors, under the supervision of Volz, of Bell, Klein and Hoffman.

Subsequent efforts will center on redoing the kitchen, attic and basement, as well as exterior work.

The house was purchased for $270,000, and so far approximately $300,000 more has been spent on repairs. The money has been obtained from foundations as well as in-house contributions, entirely separate from the league's other philanthropic projects.

Tours will be scheduled by appointment for groups of six or fewer, but individuals who show up at the door will be shown through if doing so doesn't interfere with scheduled groups. Admission is $2 per person. Reservations may be made by calling 332-5875. Nancy Brackett is museum chairman.

At last, a look inside that house

The McFarland house officially is designated the Eddleman-McFarland house, for the two families who occupied it throughout most of its history. The league's policy has been to preserve the edifice much as it was in 1978, at the end of Mrs. McFarland's life, rather than restore it to some arbitrarily chosen time. Furnishings were not included in the purchase, so replacements will attempt to comply with the former owner's tastes.

"We are preserving this house — not restoring it to a certain period — because it was changed periodically by the Eddleman-McFarland families," said Anne Paup, the league's publicity chairman. Structurally, however, it remains virtually intact.

The house was built between 1898 and 1900 for the Ball family of Galveston, designed by architect Howard Messer of the Fort Worth firm of Messer, Sanguinet and Messer (later Sanguinet and Staats). Sarah Ball and her son, Frank M. Ball, lived there before their deaths, and Weatherford banker W.H. Eddleman purchased the house in 1904 from their estate.

Eddleman and his wife, their daughter, Carrie, and her husband, F. Hays McFarland, moved in, remaining there until their deaths. Mrs. McFarland was the last survivor, living alone for 40 years after her husband's death. Junior League bought the house from Chandler Lindsley of Dallas, to whose children it was willed.

"Architects believe it's one of the finest examples of Victorian architecture left standing in the state," said Susan Layne, incoming chairman of the league's McFarland House Committee. (Anne Lange is current chairman.) Described as late Victorian picturesque architecture in a modified Queen Anne style, it is listed on the National Register of Historic Places and has a Texas historical marker.

In true Victorian style, the design features an asymmetrical floor plan and roofline, finials (spires), dormer windows, stained glass windows, wraparound porch and other elaborate elements. As Junior Leaguers discovered when they repeatedly asked Austin restoration architect John Volz, "What's this for?" many details are just for show.

"Natural" materials — pressed brick, Colorado sandstone on the exterior, pink Georgian marble in the baths, slate and copper on the roof — are in keeping with a Victorian predilection for the virtues of nature.

The guided tours are intended to give insight into Fort Worth history by focusing on the house's occupants. "Mrs. McFarland was so typical (of a Victorian lady) that in talking about her life" you're really talking about the era itself.

The most striking interior feature is a plenitude of woodwork: ornamental coffered ceilings, massive winding staircase, parquet floors of a different pattern in each room, wainscoting, fancy molding. Oak is used throughout most of the house, but mahogany sets the formal parlor apart.

Downstairs, the house boasts front and central halls, corner foyer, front and back parlors, dining room and back hall. All chandeliers and stained glass are original. Fireplaces, bay windows and arched French doors are other features.

The bedrooms upstairs (off limits to tourists) have been converted into offices for the Junior League, Mayfest and the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County.

These rooms employ the principle of adaptive reuse, being updated with no attempt at authentic decor. But irrevocable changes have been avoided. If need be, the rooms could be restored to their original look.

The guided tours are intended to give insight into Fort Worth history by focusing on the house's occupants. "Mrs. McFarland was so typical (of a Victorian lady) that in talking about her life" you're really talking about the era itself, Layne commented.

For example, the Eddlemans came to Fort Worth from Weatherford, as did many other families at the time, and the house they purchased exemplifies Victorian tastes. Somewhat conservative in style for the period, it features the then-innovative combination gas and electric light fixtures, as preparations were made for the transition to electricity. But nobody trusted electricity, so there was gas to fall back on.

Carrie McFarland, as a typical Victorian lady, wrote verse, grew flowers in the garden behind the house, drew and did dainty handwork. But she also had a good head for math and kept the family books until shortly before her death. Late in life she developed a taste for poker games with her woman friends, who eventually insisted that they would stop visiting unless she installed air conditioning in the house. So that feat was accomplished in the 1950s.

Efforts to preserve the house are progressing in phases. The first, which consisted of checking the foundation and plumbing, was completed more than a year ago. Phase two began in August 1981, with cleaning of woodwork, painting, replacing missing segments of molding and other fix-up activities conducted by James H. The McFarland House Opening

by Debbie Dewees

On a sultry Sunday September afternoon, League members – both past and present – gathered to formally open the doors of the McFarland House, the Junior League's gift to the city of Ft. Worth which was purchased during the Fiftieth Anniversary Celebration in 1979.

The Late Victorian Picturesque house was once a part of Quality Hill, the area in which many old pioneer families settled. During its 84 years it has stood watch on an ever changing Ft. Worth skyline, and after being renovated and "spruced up" looks out on a city preparing to enter the 21st century.

For League members, it was an afternoon of reminiscing with friends and inspecting the new League offices.

Past Presidents Mary Stewart Brumley and Louise Appleman greet Duane Gage, Chairman of the Tarrant County Historical Commission.

Susan Layne, McFarland House Chairman, is interviewed by Channel 11 News.

Paula Kay Paschall, who provided gentle harp music throughout the afternoon, plays beneath the signed original Quezel chandelier made by Tiffany apprentice, Martin Bach.

Mary Ann Benson listens to Past President Linda Roodhouse in the upstairs Conference Room.

Betty Brown, 1969-70 League President, pauses at the landing before checking out the new Mayfest office upstairs.

Enjoying refreshments on the lawn are Peggy Bowie and Barbara Clemmons.

Carol Roark, who was instrumental in acquiring both the Texas Historical Medallion and placing the home on the National Register of Historic Places, chats with McFarland House architect John Volz and New York architect Jim Smith.

Saginaw observes heritage

By DEBBIE MITCHELL
Star-Telegram Writer

To the people who live there, Saginaw is no mere suburb. Snuggled tightly against the northern limits of Fort Worth, the town of 6,000 is a place with an identity of its own, built for 100 years on everything from flour to fighter planes.

After all, Saginaw was the starting point for country singer Bob Wills and his Light Crust Doughboys and television evangelist Rex Humbard.

Saginaw is the unofficial grain elevator capital of the southern United States and the home of the first air-conditioned school in Tarrant County.

And lest someone forget, the town is 100 years old this year.

Saginaw, Tarrant Co., Texas
Centennial Celebration

Beginning Friday, residents will be celebrating the centennial with everything from the traditional street dances to less traditional belly dancers. The mayor of Saginaw, Mich., for which the town is named, is expected to attend the festivities. The whole community is gearing up for a once-in-a-century good time.

The centennial committee has been working for more than a year to stage a musical extravaganza, cow chip-throwing contest, mechanical armadillo race, pancake breakfast, chili cook-off and bridge tournament. But the biggest task, committee members said, has been exposing the underpinnings of Saginaw's past.

It seems, they said, that nobody has bothered to write down anything for the last 100 years. As one resident, who begged anonymity, said: "Saginaw just hasn't had a very lusty past."

Younger residents, complaining of a slow, country existence, said two armed robberies in 1981 at the Saginaw Gas House, a combination convenience store and filling station, were the most exciting happenings in recent years. Old-timers, however, have other memories of the town.

Their reminiscences about ice cream socials, baptizings at Wandry's Lake or the arrival of the grain elevators weave the fabric that is Saginaw's past.

Saginaw is more utilitarian than pretty, with its mobile home factories and grain elevators that dominate the horizon. It is not unlike other Texas prairie towns that grew from farming communities into treeless centers of industry, more designed with purpose than an eye for aesthetics.

City fathers have tamed a three-mile stretch of U.S. Highway 287 with two stoplights, a handful of fast-food restaurants, some gas stations and a city hall. Known as Saginaw Boulevard, the road is the main drag, the downtown and a former notorious North Texas speed trap.

The highway is flanked on one side by great gray grain elevators and a train yard. On the other side are businesses and neighborhoods, odd juxtapositions of old frame houses and new brick ones.

Residents complain that the highway, forcing growth westward, has turned Saginaw into a "one-sided" town. A few lament that the town has no square.

But layout and logistics aside, most residents are fiercely proud of their community. As one 72-year resident remarked: "They say most people who leave Saginaw eventually come back. I just never saw any reason to leave."

Saginaw was built around what in 1882 was a tiny farming community known as Dido. George Stohl, a Michigan native, plotted the town and named it after his home of Saginaw, Mich. Though the town was not incorporated until 1948, residents trace their history to Stohl and the first settlers.

Not much of the original town is left, but longtime residents will note there wasn't much to begin with.

When Caryl Naugle arrived in 1910, Saginaw had maybe 25 houses, two train depots, two dry goods stores, a blacksmith shop, a cotton gin and a cotton yard that often doubled as a baseball diamond for rough-and-tumble games with the boys from Boyd or Haslett.

Nobody had electricity or indoor plumbing in those days, and by 1920, the town boasted only three or four telephones. Automobiles were even more scarce.

Baptizings, picnics under an enormous pine tree planted on Blue Mound by Teddy Roosevelt, square dances at Lake Worth and school plays were among the important events in those halcyon days.

And then there were the last of the cattle drives along the Chisholm Trail just after the turn of the century. Saginaw wasn't exactly a stop on the trail — the cattle just kept going — but a few old-timers can remember seeing the mile-long walls of cattle surging through town.

In the early 1930s, Burrus Mill and Elevator Co. moved from Fort Worth to Saginaw, becoming the first of the grain storage elevators and mills that would bring jobs and people to the town.

Cargill Inc. bought and expanded Burrus Mill in 1972, making it the largest grain storage company in the world. And in 1981, Cargill's Burrus Milling Department was expanded to become the second-largest flour mill in the nation, behind Nabisco Co.'s facility in Toledo.

Saginaw, as home of Burrus Mill, was also headquarters for the Light Crust Doughboys and, for a short while, country singer Bob Wills.

Though Wills never spent much time in Saginaw, the townfolk claim him as one of their own. Music pundits generally acknowledge that Wills owes his first brush with fame to Burrus Mill.

Wills and two of his cronies were singing on Fort Worth radio station KFJZ in 1931 when W. Lee O'Daniel, owner of the mill, hired them for $10 a week to promote the mill as the Light Crust Doughboys. Wills left the group to form the Texas Playboys, but the Doughboys continued crooning into the '40s.

Evangelist Rex Humbard also got his start at Burrus Mill in 1940, recording with his family in the same studio used by the Doughboys.

In 1940, Globe Aircraft Corp. was founded in Saginaw to build civilian airplanes. The onset of World War II turned the facility into a factory for fighters and brought prosperity to the plant and town.

Planes taxiing down Haslett Road from Globe to Meacham Field would often force cars into the barrow ditches, residents recall. With the end of the war, however, the demand for fighters decreased and Globe Aircraft was forced to declare backruptcy in 1947.

In 1951, Bell Helicopter took over the old Globe facilities. Bell Helicopter/Textron is now the town's largest employer, with 700 workers.

Other major employers include Melody Homes Manufacturing Co., Wayside Homes, the Eagle Mountain-Saginaw School District, Burrus Mill and Longhorn Industries.

The industries in and near Saginaw provide a sturdy tax base for schools that residents boast of as the best in the county.

The legacy for a strong school system began in 1914 when Fannie Gillen donated land for a "modern school" to replace the one-room facility. Parents, concerned because the new building had no janitor, organized the first Parent-Teacher Association in the county outside the Fort Worth system.

Saginaw and Eagle Mountain school districts merged in 1958, and in 1961, W.E. Boswell High School was built for $819,000 as the first air-conditioned school in the county.

Saginaw has grown steadily since the early 1960s, but the real surge in population has come in the last 10 years. In 1971, Saginaw reached the 2,500 population needed for postal home delivery.

Since then, housing subdivisions have cropped up in the sunflower fields. The Bank of Saginaw and two strip shopping centers have been built. The town has more than doubled in size.

Longtime residents will smile and shake their heads at all the changes, but as Mrs. Naugle said: "It's good to see progress. Nowadays, you have more time to see what's happening and to enjoy it. I can't digest all of it, but I get a good glimpse now and then."

Committee meets for Pioneer Day

The Hurst Pioneer Day Committee will meet 7 p.m. April 20 in the small meeting room at the Hurst Public Library.

The meeting is scheduled to prepare for Pioneer Day, slated Oct. 6 from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. at Chisholm Park.

They also will be looking for anyone who would like to help with arrangements or who has a general interest in Pioneer Day.

Anyone who is interested in Hurst's Pioneer Day celebration may contact Clarice Vogt at 498-5476.

Pioneer festival to return

Pioneer Days are back again.

The first annual Hurst Pioneer Days festival last year helped pay for tasks like cleaning up the Parker Cemetry, one of the oldest in Tarrant County, and erecting a memorial plaque to honoring Hurst's first citizen William "Uncle Billy" Hurst.

Tonight at 7:30 Hurst Pioneer Days organizers will hold a planning session at Hurst Public Library in an attempt to organize the second annual Hurst Pioneer Days slated in October.

Chairman Clarice Vogt said anyone interested in volunteering their services or in setting up a booth is invited to attend.

Help is being sought from all local civic groups, she said. However, booths are not limited to these groups and also can be set up by individuals or family teams interested in selling arts, crafts, food or other items.

"We're hoping to expand everywhere. We've rented out a larger section of Chisholm Park. Last year we had 52 booths and we hope to have many more this year," she said.

Sponsors must set up their own booths.

Space for booths without electricity can be rented for $25. Those with electricity cost $40.

The Frontier Gunslingers of Colleyville fire their guns during a rehearsal for the Saginaw Centennial celebration.

The Dallas Morning News: Howard Castleberry

Colleyville gunslingers recreate frontier days

By Barbara Clark
Mid-Cities Bureau of the News

COLLEYVILLE — Two gunshots ring out in the stillness of a summer evening, and the Colleyville police officers driving down McCain Lane wheel their car around and head back toward the home of Pat and Ben Gray. They know what they will find.

Doug Stults lies on the ground without moving. Ben Gray swigs a glass of brown liquid and lifts his chaps as he puts his Colt .44 back into its holster.

The two officers like to catch Wednesdays at the Grays — when the Grays and two other couples rehearse their gunfighting act. This time, they are preparing for the Saginaw Centennial celebration Labor Day weekend.

None of the Frontier Gunslingers are a professional actors. The three men are construction workers, and the women work as a schoolbus driver, a waitress and a funeral counselor. The idea of the gunslinging skits "just kind of happened" at a party they attended in Justin.

"Ben and two others had a stagecoach to give rides to the kids, and they decided one would drive it and the other two would hold it up," Mrs. Gray said.

The antics led to the birth of their own Gunsmoke characters — Texas Ben and Miss Pat, saloon girl Rosie and Doc (in real life Debra and David Chancey of Grapevine) and Diamond Lil and Marshall Newt (Mary Lou and Doug Stults of Haslet).

It's all a game and gives them something to do on the weekends, Mrs. Chancey said.

But the game also goes deeper.

"I wish we had lived a long time ago," Mrs. Gray said. "I'm a romantic and when you look back, it looks very romantic. I'm sure there were lots of hard times and things that we don't see when we look back."

She talks, sitting at a little wooden table in a room that has a turn-of-the-century look — a pot-bellied stove, an old bed with its cotton mattress and iron frame, oil lamps gleaming from each table. Kitchen shelves are lined with old pottery, food tins and other "junktiques." The room is their getaway room getting away from life in 1982.

"When we first built this room, we lived in it for a few days with just the kids," Mrs. Gray said. "And Bennie went out and shot rabbits, he and (son) Benji. And we stayed in here and cooked. It was the winter we had the bad ice. And we enjoyed that."

The family likes to read about and relive the old days, she said.

"The world's so fast now, and I don't want my kids to be a part of it. I don't want to be in it, and I don't want them to be," Mrs. Gray said. "It seems like it was a better world when we were growing up."

Mrs. Gray decorated the room as a surprise for her husband one Christmas. He returned home from work and discovered the room from the past — complete with the old outhouse door from the farmhouse tacked up on the entrance.

The Grays have known each other since the 2nd grade in Anadarko, Okla, Mrs. Gray said. "He was that fat chunky little boy in the 2nd grade who always would bring me candy. We were boyfriend and girlfriend by the 7th grade. Now here we are 20 years and four kids later."

Benji is the Colleyville Kid in some of the skits, and once in a while gets killed with the rest. "We try to switch the roles around where nobody has to die all the time," Gray said.

Now the sun sets on the sprawling Colleyville farmhouse. The chickens out back cluck as the sun goes down as Texas Ben loads his gun with black powder.

Places, everybody! Marshall Newt plays outlaw Newt who has a chip on his shoulder. And Texas Ben can't stand for Lil to be mishandled by that rude cowboy. The shots ring out, and the smell of gunpowder fills the air.

The two Colleyville officers wheel into the drive for the fun. And everyone sits around another Wednesday, chewin' the fat and planning their next show.

Newt picks himself up, dusts himself off and puts his arm around Diamond Lil, his real wife of only three months. "Umm, I love the smell of gunpowder."

Chisholm Trail Round-Up

This year's Chisholm Trail Round-Up, June 11-13, will again kick off with the annual 25-mile trail ride commemorating the cattle drives of yesterday from South Texas to Abilene, Kansas. Entries are now being accepted for the ride, which will begin Friday, June 11 at noon. Last year more than 250 riders participated.

The drive's scenic country route begins at Lake Country Estates Stables near Lake Worth and travels through private ranch land and along Marine Creek toward the Stockyards. Brief stops are scheduled for entertainment at a working ranch along the way and at Buck Sansom Park. Riders may join the group at these two locations if they miss the beginning of the trip.

Anyone who doesn't own a horse is encouraged to rent one for the day at the stables. A special addition to this year's ride is singing cowboy Steve Mitchell, who will bring along his guitar and Gene Autry sound for all to enjoy.

The annual Chisholm Trail Round-Up Parade in the Forth Worth stockyards is one of the many events held during the three-day Chisholm Trail Round-Up festivities which commemorate the famous cattle trail and what it meant to Fort Worth's growth in the early days. Participants in the parade include all types of vehicles, from horse-drawn to mechanical, and from stage coaches and antique cars to decorated floats. Riding groups and individuals also participate.

The parade follows Exchange Avenue west from Packers Avenue to Ellis and begins at 11 am.

Amid all the street dances, chili cook-offs, gunfights, bazaars and other activities scheduled for the annual Chisholm Trail Round-Up June 11-13, kids of all ages can participate in events exclusively for them at the Little Buckaroos' Corral on the east side of Cowtown Coliseum.

Youngsters from two years old and up can enter contests, races and other activities. Coloring contests, haystack hunts, stick horse races, thumbprint pictures, clown face painting, roping contests, hoop rolling contests, surrey rides and leather lacing and beads are some of the many events scheduled.

The coloring contest is split into five age groups, and kids will color western-themed pictures to be judged at the end of each day Saturday and Sunday. Trophies will be awarded to the best entries in each division each day.

will be given to the first 400 entries and trophies will be awarded to the top three finishers in each of 13 male and female age divisions.

The Ranch Hand Competition, held in Cowtown Coliseum, will pit teams of cowboys from area ranches against each other in events similar to ranch work.

Fort Worth's Chisholm Trail Round-Up Celebration offers everyone a chance to step back into history and relive the excitement, action and romance of the mid-1800s when hundreds of thousands of Longhorns were driven through enroute to Kansas.

In the haystack hunt, youngsters can dive into a haystack full of prizes to claim one for themselves. They can ride a wooden horse and try to lasso a wooden steer, or gallop for T-shirts and other prizes in the stick horse races.

The Little Buckaroos' Corral will also have its own stagecoach in the Saturday morning parade.

Three big new events have been added to this year's Chisholm Trail Round-Up, June 11-13. The first Annual Chisholm Trail Run, a Ranch Hand Competition and Wild West Excursions will debut during the weekend festivities.

The Chisholm Trail Run will be Sunday morning at 9 am, and is a 4.4-mile course beginning at Rodeo Park and ending in the Stockyards. T-shirts Categories will include paint branding, wild horse saddling, cutting and penning calves, and many more.

The Wild West Excursion will be a special walking tour of Exchange Avenue, leaving every half-hour during the day Saturday and Sunday from Marine Creek Alley across from Cowtown Coliseum. Along the way participants will be greeted and entertained by characters from the old days, who know the area's history better than anyone. Big John Duke, Clem Jumper, Dirty Dan, Miss Catty and Elwood P. Sluggins are just a few of the folks who will dramatize the life of the Stockyards in their heyday.

Making converts to the visitor industry

old when his grandfather took him 400 miles by train to Melbourne. There he saw flush toilets, electricity and hot and cold running water, things he had never seen before. He was the first of his eight brothers and sisters to experience the city and the first to leave the country in search of some kind of fortune.

He will not reveal his age, but he has been traveling for the better part of 12 years, he said. His heels finally cooled eight months ago at the tourist bureau here. McCallum, his Texas-born, ranch-bred wife and their two young daughters moved into a West Side house and the affinity McCallum has with Fort Worth began to grow.

He admits that just about everything he does is calculated to allow out-of-towners to see and love the city as much as he does. Sure, this is only the honeymoon stage, but it seems genuine good feelings have taken root and he is letting them grow.

MCCALLUM'S COURTSHIP of Fort Worth was brief and inspired, to hear him tell it. It lasted through two interviews with Chamber of Commerce officials. The chamber has the franchise for the Convention and Visitors Bureau, administers C&VB monies and houses it in the chamber offices at 700 Throckmorton St.

After McCallum's first session with the chamber he said he knew he had to have the job.

"I went back to San Angelo, where we were living, and told my wife I really wanted to work in Fort Worth," he said. "As I thought about it and prepared for the second interview I was just filled with this sense of — mission — really. This is a calling to me. I would have been devastated if I hadn't gotten the job."

Chamber director Bill Shelton, who offered him the post, said McCallum's style is new for Texas, certainly for Fort Worth. He is the maverick in a sea of three-piece suits. He wears his boots, blue jeans and bandana-topped western shirt to the office. His reasoning is quite simple: Visitors remember

"He had two strong qualifications we saw when we hired him," Shelton said. "Paul does know the visitor industry well. There are few in Texas who know it like he does. Most come from hotel and conventions sales, but the visitor industry is different.

"Paul comes from Australia and worked in the business in Melbourne. (He was director of the Melbourne Tourist Bureau.) For years they were under the shadow of Sydney and he was aware of that situation. They made great strides in Melbourne. His professionalism will pay off here even more in the future."

MCCALLUM'S OFFICE IS small and his desk is cluttered with phone messages. At 10 a.m. his eyes are dull after a long night with the English constituency.

"I made three or four converts last night," he said, with a little, earnest smile. "They'll work with us in the future."

The evening began at Larry Smith's LS Ranch. Smith let the agents hand-feed Longhorn steers and buffalo. Then Smith and his family joined the group for a family-style barbecue and then one of Smith's ranchhands got out the guitar and played and sang.

Later the pampered tourists did the Exchange Avenue amble, hitting Cowtown USA where everybody wanted to learn to dance, and then, at midnight, the White Elephant Saloon where Texas Water lullabyed them with Scottish, Irish and English ballads.

"That completely weaved the program together," McCallum said. "They were melted. They danced their little hearts away and closed the place down. We got back to the hotel at about 3 a.m. and they were tired. It was like an 18-hour day for them. But still they wanted to stay down in the lobby and talk.

"Well, I was tired myself and would have gladly gone home, but it was important for me to stay. I gave them Fort Worth T-shirts, not as a gimmick, but as a gift, you see. They are on a seven-city tour in as many days and it's very important that they remember this city distinctly."

He seemed sure that they would.

"You give me three hours with anybody," said McCallum, "and I can sell them Fort Worth. I know they're in the grip of Fort Worth when I see them stop thinking about being here on a paid program and they become part of what we're doing. That's when I know we have created a memorable sequence of events." Translate that into future tourist dollars.

MCCALLUM LOOKS LIKE a cowboy. His complexion is fair and unlined. A white straw Stetson usually shades his brown eyes. He rarely smiles, or if he does, you don't see it because of the mustache. He gives one the impression of being a carelessly neat person, one who is creative and savvy. The hot-shot McCallum package is softened by his twangy accent and cowboy outfit.

"One reason I wanted to come here so much is that it's the first time I've had an emotional involvement with the product," he said.

"People say I'm crazy the way I go on, but to me it isn't a job. It's almost a crusade. That blows people away."

He was pleasant with the English visitors, a superb host who said he treats every group as if it is the only one he has ever hosted. That means drinking, or appearing to drink, with them, eating, dancing and chatting afternoons and nights away with them.

Yes, it could be a grind, he admitted. He doesn't get to see a lot of his family, he's always on the move; but McCallum seems really to enjoy it all, right down to chauffeuring visiting VIPs about in the chamber's snazzy bus.

"I've searched the world for 10 years for a place that I feel this way about," he said. He relates to the people, their values, the land and lay-out of this part of the world.

This is home.

"Damn right," he said. "I don't feel like I'm selling a town, I feel like I'm sharing a treasure."

If there is a dark side to all of this, it may be the spectre of the "best kept secret in the country" becoming an exploited, touristy town, gutted to accommodate travel-happy tourists.

"I have had qualms about making it into a touristy place," McCallum said. "After I'd been here about two months I knew I could be successful here, but am I going to inflict a scar on Fort Worth? That's what I wondered.

"But the more I got to know the leaders and movers in town, I believe they would not let Fort Worth be ruined. It has developed in a reasonably orderly way, not too fast. I feel it won't damage the fabric of the city to have a healthy tourist industry."

It will be trendy to be in Fort Worth, McCallum said. "The popularity boom has yet to reach here, but (when it happens) I think the place will influence the visitor to conform or blend in. People will want to be like a Fort Worther."

THE LAST THING Fort Worth people may want or need is to be emulated, but the confluence of time and place make Cowtown an oasis of sorts. McCallum calls it the last authentic Texas city.

"I'm being philosophical now, but our nation is so in search of what is real and genuine. We're just coming out of the tinfoil, razzle-dazzle age. We've lost contact with our grandparents, our parents. We're seeking realness in the world. I feel it comes across in Fort Worth, that realnesss.

"You can walk down Main Street and six out of 10 people you'll meet were born and raised in Fort Worth. That sense of belonging rubs off. People want to grab on to the cowboy-or cowgirl-ness here. And what that is, is really a free spirit. That's what we're talking about."

We're also talking about big bucks, future plans, freeway madness, the selling of a town, all of which are inimical to the free spirit that built the West.

"Well, have you ever noticed when you're riding down the highway, you'll see a ranch and there will be an old run-down house, then a few feet away there will be a nice new house?

"Ranchers and people in the West don't tear down and rebuild, they keep the old and add the new. And that's what Fort Worth people have done. They appreciate the things that have served them," McCallum said.

"There is no Big Bang theory of growth for this town. Not at all."

The program so far is slow and very easy, kind of like McCallum's big time hustle down on Exchange Avenue.

Fort Worth's Texana a booming business

Cow patty pen sets are also popular with visitors; Texas Dry Goods can't keep them in stock. Former Beatle Paul McCartney recently ordered 36 of them from Billy Bob's representatives in London on business, he said.

According to Ventimigilia, other celebrities have gone on buying sprees at Billy Bob's. Mick Jagger bought 50 red nylon satin jackets to give his band last year when the Rolling Stones passed through Dallas on their concert tour.

Texas Dry Goods is now selling a $300 limited edition performing artist autograph jacket, which has been autographed by 15 C&W celebrities. One hundred jackets are included in this edition. Successive limited edition jackets will be signed by other artists.

INTERNATIONAL TOURISTS tend to steer clear of knickknacks, merchants say. Instead, they buy western clothes and accessories that they can pack easily or wear — jeans, belts, buckles, bandanas and cowboy hats.

Europeans stock up on $15 Levis and Wranglers; the same jeans at home cost $75-$90 a pair.

"They go wild. They take as much as they can carry. It's crazy," said Louis Luskey of Luskey's Western Wear.

Russian visitors have tried to barter for goods with caviar, he said. And the Japanese are particularly fond of getting their names — Masahara, Hiroyuki — put on buckstitch name belts.

"They buy the stuff, then come back the next day and show us pictures of them wearing it. They have excellent cameras and like to take pictures around the store. They get around the boots and hats and then put on a big hat and stand there like they've just drawn their six-shooter. It's the funniest thing," he laughed.

"These people get so friendly. And they love our Texas friendliness and hospitality. If Fort Worth can keep providing that, that's better than anything they buy," Luskey added.

VISITORS WHO LIKE to take pictures are drawn into Cowboy Culture on Sundance Square as much by manager Roy Stanton as the dozens of cowboy hats mounted on the walls.

The former bullrider is the epitome of cowboy, with his Johnny Cash black western shirt, boots, large hat and champion all-around cowboy silver with gold inlay belt buckle.

He remembers two visitors from Tokyo.

"They had me sit here, stand there. I had to pose with each of them and, of course, they both had about four cameras around their neck. I was flashbulbed to death," Stanton recalled.

Eighty percent of his trade is tourist, primarily guests from the nearby Hyatt Regency and Americana hotels.

Last March a conventioneer came into the store, handed Stanton his American Express card and instructed him to fit 15 of his business associates with cowboy hats when they visited the store.

"He just left his ticket open," Stanton said.

TOURISTS, ON THE WHOLE, do not buy quality western clothes, merchants said.

"They don't see western as fine Resistol $400 beaver hats. They see it as stereotyped Urban Cowboy. They go for the $25 precreased hats with feathered bands. We call them punk hats," Renee Shearer, sales person at Leddy's Western Wear, observed.

Jamie McClain, boot department manager at Ryon's, agreed.

"Somebody who wears a hat all the time is not afraid to spend $150 to $200 for a hat or to drop $300 or $400 for a pair of handmade boots. Tourists spend $35 to $50 for a hat, $100 for boots," he said.

Since Ryon's caters to genuine horse and cattle people, clothing displayed on the racks tends to be more conservative and less flashy.

"We get a lot of tourists in the store, but we don't get much of their business. They buy a few gift items — leather bookmarkers and such," McClain said.

The Americana Hotel gift shop has a healthy tourist business with shelves stocked with armadillo paperweights, Eyes of Texas chocolate candy, Dallas Cowboys logo socks, boot cigarette lighters, rodeo coffee mugs, tote bags in the shape of a boot, Ya'll Come Back Ya Hear! glasses, cowbells, and the oversized "Texas" cigars, flies and fly swatters.

One of the most popular trinkets is a device that emits cow mooing sounds, said store manager Trecina Hutchins.

Elson's at the Hyatt Regency stocks other forms of Texana — candles shaped into the form of cowboy hats and saddles, ceramic boot ashtrays and key chains, Southfork Ranch postcards, T-shirts, chili spices and fixin's kits and Daniel Montfort Western sculpture.

EASTERNERS AND international tourists like to take home Texas-shaped tortilla chips from Neiman-Marcus' Red River Saloon, accompanied by jars of jalapeno nacho slices, queso sauce and canned chilis.

Visitors to Fort Worth's art museums don't buy souvenirs as such. Instead they buy postcards, books and prints of their favorite paintings.

The Kimbell Art Museum sells a lot of copies of Light is the Theme by Nell Johnson to European and Japanese architects. Johnson's book is about the museum building and architect Louis I. Kahn.

Fort Worth's cultural life is the least represented on the souvenir shelves.

Fort Worth Convention & Visitors Bureau officials are aware of this, although they continue to use the western theme in promotions.

Those responsible for bringing in convention business, for example, receive a free pair of cowboy boots. Promotional items sent to meeting planners across the country include T-shirts, baseball caps, hat pins and belt buckles with the Fort Worth logo on them.

"PEOPLE ARE STILL caught up in the western thing. It's one of the strongest reasons they come to Fort Worth. We do have the cowboy image. The cowboy and western thing is in vogue right now. Obviously, we're going to do everything to capitalize on it," said Jeff Russell, executive director of the convention and visitors bureau.

First priority of city promoters, he said, is to get Fort Worth's name before the public.

The bureau is now making arrangements to put more souvenirs on the shelves, souvenirs that say "Fort Worth," even if that means products with the city logo on them only.

"Even if it's just the name, hopefully when someone asks about Fort Worth, the person wearing the cap or T-shirt will take it from there. Word-of-mouth is powerful," Russell said.

Russian visitors have tried to barter for goods with caviar, he said. And the Japanese are particularly fond of getting their names — Masahara, Hiroyuki — put on buckstitch name belts.

City rounding up its past

Parade celebrates frontier roots

Horseless and horse-drawn carriages and all kinds of vehicles in between will line up Saturday, June 12, when the Chisholm Trail Round-Up Parade winds through the streets leading to the Fort Worth Stockyards.

The parade is part of the three-day Chisholm Trail Round-Up festivities celebrating Fort Worth's frontier town roots and is open to anyone with a vehicle — from stagecoaches and antique cars to decorated floats. Riding groups and individuals also are invited to join the parade.

The column of vehicles and marchers will roll down Exchange Avenue west from Packers Avenue to Ellis at 11 a.m. Saturday. Prizes will be awarded to the best-dressed and most colorful groups and to the group that travels the farthest to join the parade.

Other events adding western flavor to Round-Up activities include armadillo races, a chili cook-off, Western writers' workshop, street dances, little buckaroos' events, an art exhibit, gunfighters, a trail ride, an all-girl rodeo, a fast-draw competition and a chuck wagon barbecue.

Would-be paraders should contact Mary Harper at the Fort Worth Convention and Visitors Bureau, 700 Throckmorton.

Trail ride follows cowboy tradition

The Chisholm Trail Round-Up, three days of celebrating Fort Worth's pioneer past, will kick off Friday, June 11, when about 250 riders will follow a 25-mile trail ride in the tradition of the cowboys who herded cattle from South Texas to Kansas.

Riders will begin at Lake Country Estates Stables near Lake Worth and canter through private ranchland and along Marine Creek on their way to the Stockyards. The group will stop at a working ranch and at Buck Sansom Park.

Modern-day wranglers who have opted for a horseless carriage can rent a horse for a day at the stables.

Trail riders, who are scheduled to reach the Stockyards between 5 and 6 p.m., will be met with a chuck wagon barbecue supper. Registration cost, which includes supper, is $15.

Interested riders should register with Mary Harper at the Chamber of Commerce before June 10 or sign up at the stables before 10 a.m. June 11. To reach Lake Country Estates Stables from downtown Fort Worth, take Texas Highway 199 past Loop 820 and go north nine miles on Boat Club Road.

Round-up features 3 new events

For the Chisholm Trail cowboys of the 1870s and 1880s, Fort Worth was the last great whoop-and-holler spot before the long drive north to Kansas. Trail bosses and cooks stocked up on provisions from Fort Worth merchants, while trail hands stocked up on good times, spending a night or two carousing in the the infamous Hell's Half Acre.

The Chisholm Trail shut down for good 98 years ago, but the notion of a Chisholm Trail celebration was revived in 1976 by the North Fort Worth Historical Society. The modern version is certainly more wholesome than the cowboy ventures of a century ago, but its premise is about the same: good times and Western lore.

This year's round-up, to be held Friday, Saturday and Sunday at the historic Fort Worth Stockyards, features three new events — a 4.4-mile Chisholm Trail run at 9 a.m. Sunday, a Ranch Hand Competition and Wild West Excursion walking tours — in addition to the usual parade, trail ride, street dances, gunfights, children's coral and crafts exhibitions.

This year's 25-mile trail ride will head out from the Lake Country Estates Stables at noon Friday. Last year, more than 250 riders participated. The ride will tarry for a while at a working ranch for some entertainment, and stop again at Buck Sansom Park before hoofing into the Stockyards between 5 and 6 p.m. for a chuck wagon barbecue supper. To register, call Mary Harper at the Chamber of Commerce (336-2491) by Thursday, or sign up at the stables before 10 a.m. Friday. Fee for the ride and supper is $15.

The Chisholm Trail parade, featuring stage coaches, horse-drawn carriages, mechanical floats and bands, will begin at 11 a.m. Saturday, following Exchange Avenue west from Packers Avenue to Ellis Street.

Every half-hour during the day on Saturday and Sunday, the Wild West Excursion walking tour of the Stockyards area will set out from Marine Creek Alley. Along the way, participants will be greeted and entertained by old-time characters like Big John Duke, Clem Jumper and Elwood P. Sluggins.

The fifth annual Western Writers' Workshop will take place all day Friday at the old Maverick Hotel.

The Little Buckaroos' Corral for children will include a haystack hunt for prizes, coloring contests, stick horse races and clown face painting.

During the three-day celebration, the Stockyards area will be lined with arts and crafts booths, food stalls, and other exhibitions. Old West shoot-outs, armadillo races, rattlesnake shows, music and other special events will flavor the celebration Saturday and Sunday. Street dances commence at 9 p.m Saturday and Sunday.

Other events include an all-girl rodeo, a daylong chili cookoff Saturday, fast-draw competition, fire department hose-off and a longhorn steer exhibition.

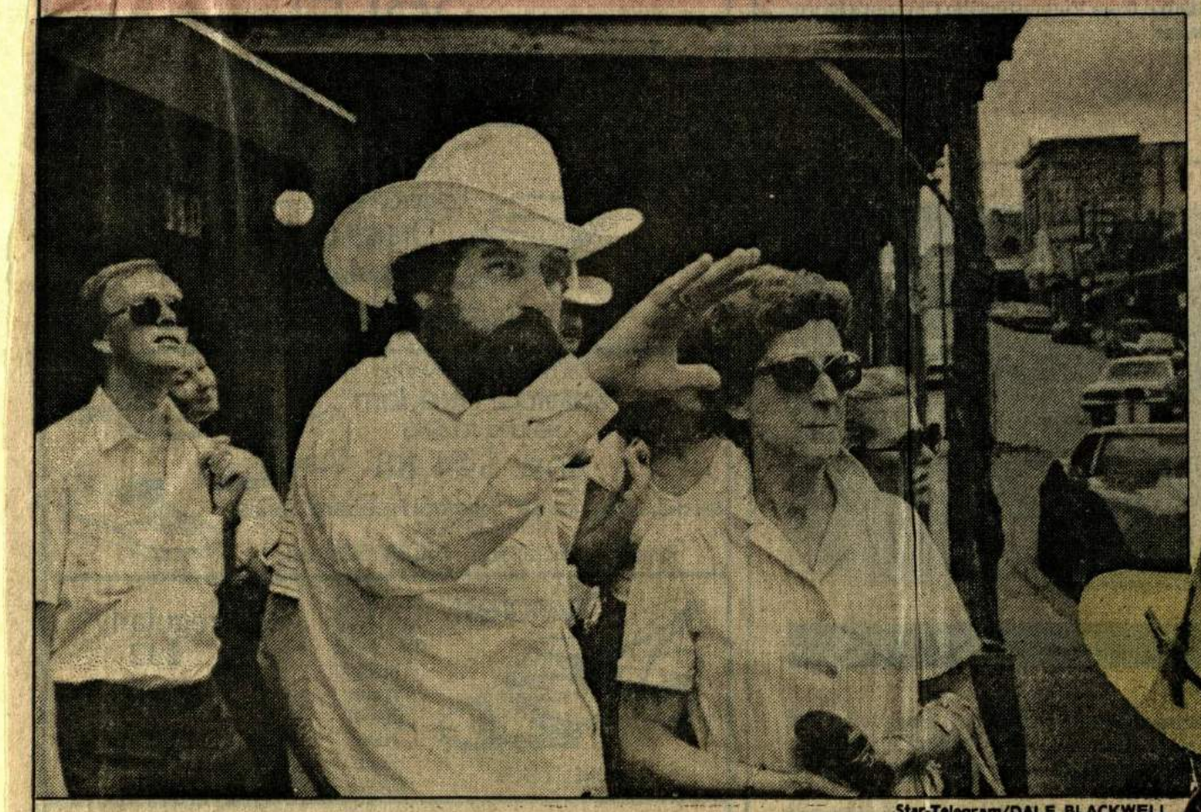
The selling of

COWTOWN



Star-Telegram/DALE BLACKWELL

Touring Fort Worth soon will be trendy

By TERRY HILLER
Star-Telegram Writer

The clarity of the afternoon no doubt slipped away unnoticed by people in reflective glass skyscrapers. Washed by spring rains, the sky was prepollutant blue and the clouds were the kinds poets watch and write about.

Cowtown looked wholesome and good beneath them.

On Exchange Avenue, bearded, long-haired Paul McCallum, in his cowboy duds, soaked up the day and its pleasure.

"It's amazing," McCallum said, gloating over this little slice of town, this nice piece of good weather. "Here we are in an urban setting and it's like we're back in time. It's a beautiful afternoon. It's peaceful, there's a nice breeze, it's not too humid. It's great."

You could smell dust in the air, mingled with the livestock aroma of generations of cattle, pigs and horses which passed this way. Footsteps on the wooden walk sounded good and solid, as if those who made them knew where they were going.

McCallum was playing it up, working hard selling a group of English travel agents Fort Worth's history, food, art, even its cow dung, which is by now a historical treasure.

The English delegation, with a couple of beers under each of their belts, listened attentively as the city's newest public relations man lobbed them historical tidbits.

Without being one bit corny, even though dressed in loose-fitting western clothes, the Australian cowboy blitzed the 20 Britons with the kind of spiel that gets to the heart of the matter.

There's no bull in McCallum's style. It's the Down-Home Big-Time Rag, or Honestly Now, Look What We Got.

What we have is a $1 billion visitors industry in Fort Worth and Tarrant County, according to the Texas Tourist Development Agency, and the business shows every sign of getting bigger and richer in 1982. McCallum, the director of tourism development for the Fort Worth Convention & Visitors Bureau, has the fulltime $27,500-a-year job of keeping the money coming in.

Born on a ranch in the Malee region of Australia 30-odd years ago with a bad case of wanderlust, he has traveled to most parts of the world.

He recalled his first venture away from the bushland and Outback. He was 13 years

A land office trade in FW souvenirs

Like Florida sells seashells and sunshine and New York the Statue of Liberty, Fort Worth's multi-million dollar souvenir industry revolves around symbols of the Old West and other stereotypes — cowboys, oil wells, armadillos and Lone Star beer.

Souvenirs for sale in Fort Worth run the gamut, from quality to schlock, from $1,200 exotic skin boots to ceramic covered wagon salt and pepper shakers.

Stockyards Rexall Drug appears to be the most unabashed vendor of Texana trinkets. Its shelves are glutted with Foat Wuth Ah Luv Yew bumper stickers, T-shirts, gimme caps, ashtrays, plastic boot banks, barbed wire swizzle sticks, moccasins, Lone Star flags, cowbells, key chains and Longhorn wall trophies, priced from $8.99 to $125.

Tourists buy "anything with an armadillo on it" or "Western stuff that they can't, or think they can't, get anywhere else," reported sales clerk Brenda Beasley.

Richard Pemberton, owner of Pemberton's Wild West art gallery-gift shop in the Stockyards, exploits the armadillo further with 'dillo cartoon decals, placards, posters and T-shirts and a membership of "hundreds of thousands" in The Great Armored Armadillo Army of Texas he created.

Texas Dry Goods at Billy Bob's does a $2-million-a-year business in primarily T-shirts, baseball caps, belt buckles, hat pins, bandanas and satin nylon jackets — all stamped with the Billy Bob's logo.

The store sells other items in less volume: designer jeans, prairie skirts, tote bags, stuffed animals, feathered halter tops and cowboy boots. And there are a few un-Western items, such as golf shirts and jogging suits — stamped with the BB logo, of course.

Also for sale: a $115 child's spring Brahman bull, complete with a cowbell that jingles when the youngster bounces up and down. Roughly two of those a week sell, said general manager Joe Ventimigilia.

"I don't consider somebody from Mansfield a tourist, but we've sold them to folks from Mansfield. We have also sold them to people from Australia," Ventimigilia said.

Please see Fort Worth's on Page 6

The souvenir trade is a booming one in Fort Worth — from drinking mugs and ornamental armadillos to Texas ashtrays. Hand-tooled name belts are especially popular with Japanese tourists.

SWEET RIDE . . . the Sweet Adelines singing group rides in old Cadillac at Chisholm Trail Round-up parade

Weather couldn't rain on parade

By FRANK TREJO
Star-Telegram Writer

Those ominous clouds above Fort Worth on Saturday morning didn't even come close to dampening the spirits of the thousands of spectators who turned out at the North Side Stockyards area for the annual Chisholm Trail Round-up parade.

As this year's parade — described by organizers as the biggest such event in six years — wound its way west on Exchange toward Ellis Avenue, marchers and riders were greeted by smiling faces and friendly waves from locals and visitors gathered to get a glimpse of the past.

Most of the round-up's outdoor activities were rained out Friday night by the thunderstorms that rolled through the area, but Saturday there was no stopping the parade.

Leading the way down West Exchange was parade marshal Lt. Gen. George Miller, vice commander with the Strategic Air Command. Miller, wearing jeans and a Western shirt that probably weren't regulation, smiled broadly from under a cowboy hat.

The parade, which started on Packers Avenue not too far from a wooden sign that reads: "Abilene, Kan., 417 Mi.," is part of Fort Worth's annual celebration of the famous Chisholm Trail, and the role the trail had in developing the city's reputation as Cowtown.

Dora Jean Purcell of Cincinnati noticed something else besides cows at the parade.

"I don't think I've ever seen so many horses in my whole life," Ms. Purcell said with a laugh.

"Now you can't say Fort Worth is a one-horse town," a friend remarked with a grin.

Ms. Purcell said she was in the area visiting a cousin who lives in Denton.

"Today's our last day, but we just couldn't leave without coming here (the Stockyards) first," Ms. Purcell said.

Spectators also were treated to the sight of antique vehicles, such as stagcoaches and fringe-topped sur-reys, making their way casually down Exchange Avenue as they probably did years ago.

One of the biggest attention-getters at this year's parade was the two enormous longhorn steers being ridden by two very brave cowboys.

The proof that other people weren't so brave was seen several times when one of the monstrous longhorns turned toward the crowd, scattering a number of spectators toward safer ground.

Not all the units in the parade were of the four-legged variety. With a number of antique automobiles, two ancient fire trucks rolled passed the spectators and residents got a chance to view one of the new trolley buses

Although the horses were the big hit of the day, there were other favorites.

Three boys from Watauga looked up from behind huge cowboy hats, waved miniature American flags passed out by people on one of the floats and loudly exclaimed that their favorite units were the bands.

Visions of riding on the trail fade with a horse called Flash drowning out any aura of the good old days with their terrible roar, and a reminder that those were, indeed, simpler times.

About a half-mile along the trail, Flash displayed a streak of stubbornness: He stopped dead in his tracks and refused to budge. We sat that way for what seemed an eternity, me and Flash, as I cajoled, patted, kicked and tugged to no avail. Others tried, and they, too, failed.

Several people rode by, grinning beneath their Stetsons, and shouted: "Ride much?"

Finally, the man from the stables rode up.

"He's usually kind of hardheaded," he said, nodding in Flash's direction. "But he'll be OK once he gets going."

Easy for him to say, I thought, as he galloped off on a feisty black stallion. But how do I get him going?

Trail scout Bill Lane had the answer. He took the reins and led Flash alongside his horse. I told Lane I used to really like horses.

Several hundred yards later, I decided to give Flash another try. He ambled up behind another horse from Benbrook Stables and began following it. Fine with me, just so we kept moving.

A gust of wind caught the straw Western hat a woman in front of us was wearing, and it tumbled onto the ground just in time for Flash to crush it under his hoof. At least he didn't just pick on me.

By our first rest stop, most of the trail riders knew Flash and inquired with smirks on their faces as to how we were getting along. Enough was enough. I led Flash to the water tank, and then ol' Flash and I had a heart to heart.

I turned to walk away, and Flash either gently nuzzled my hair or tried to bite me and missed. Nice horsie, Flash.

I have to admit that from then on, things between Flash and me took a turn for the better. Ray Hiller and John Green gave me what amounted to impromptu riding lessons, and Flash showed his appreciation by actually responding to my commands.

Of course, it still hurt — in more ways than one — when Flash broke into a lope and I could hear Hiller and Green chuckle every time my behind and the saddle met with a sharp smack.

There were a lot of nice people I met on the trail ride, and I think that's probably the best part of it. I don't remember all their names, and I decided a mile or so into the ride that it's impossible to take notes and hang on for dear life at the same time.

The longhorn cattle that were to be driven to the stockyards by trail riders arrived too late, so the riders made their entry onto Exchange Avenue without the longhorns just as a fierce storm broke over the area.

Flash and I parted company tired, sweaty and hoping we'd never again see each other. I had a blob of greenish-brown gook on the elbow of my shirt that I figured was, at best, tobacco juice. When I boarded a trolley bus to get back to my car, one of the passengers asked me how many days I'd been on the trail.

I have a blister on my left thumb. I plan to tell everyone I burned myself. My legs hurt. My back hurts. And people say I'm walking real funny-like.

But I had a good time, really I did. And the folks on the ride were wonderful. It's a day I'll remember — at least until the bruises go away.

Trail-riding visions fade with a Flash

By MICHELLE SCOTT
Star-Telegram Writer

"This is your horse, Flash," the folks from Benbrook Stables said, handing me the reins to a roan who, recognizing a greenhorn when he saw one, stared at me with disdain.

Flash! Well, it could've been worse, I told myself. Like Buck. Whatever, Flash was to be my transportation Friday for the 25-mile Chisholm Trail Ride, which ambled its historic way from Lake Country Stables near Eagle Mountain Lake down Exchange Avenue to the Stockyards.

Best to make friends right off the bat, I decided. I scratched Flash's nose, patted his neck and told him with all the conviction I could muster — and a silent prayer — that he was a "good horsie."

He snorted haughtily in response. I decided to make the best of it.

All around, cowboys and cowgirls — the real, honest-to-goodness thing, mind you — already were saddled up. They stood out among us tenderfoots by sitting tall in the saddle, their hips sliding like well-oiled machinery in rhythm with their horses' gaits.

Then came the rest of us in all shapes and sizes, from the littlest buckaroo, who tied his orange Chisholm Trail bandana Superman-style around his shoulders, to the young woman in the tiny purple bikini top, cutoffs and boots.

I noticed most of the other riders brought canteens. I brought a purse.

Time to mount up and move out, announced Bob Raines, who holds the colorful title of cattle baron for the round-up.

"You doin' OK?" he asked.

"Just fine, just fine," I answered, plastering a big smile on my face. Now, let's see, do I mount from the right or the left? I tried left and heaved myself onto Flash's back. Good horsie, nice horsie.

A cute kid in a blue T-shirt, jeans and a straw Western hat adorned with bronco and covered-wagon pins reined in next to me. Shannon Woodruff, 9, of Crowley, told me his horse's name was Snipper, and this was his and Snipper's first time to ride the Chisholm Trail.

He eyed Flash and me with a serious face, wrinkled up his nose, squashing a sprinkling of freckles into oblivion, and asked: "You ride much?"

And we were off.

It was easy to imagine being on a trail drive a hundred years ago, the grass tall and bending into waves of green, the Indian paintbrushes flickering red and yellow, and thistles thrusting purple pompons skyward. The clomp and thud of the horses' hooves beat a muffled cadence on the rolling hills, breaking into a sharp clatter as they crossed paved roads.

It was easy, that is, until B-52s on practice runs boomed overhead,

Movin' out on Chisholm Trail

The Chisholm Trail is known vaguely to most Tarrant County residents as an important but undefined part of the area's early history, a route used to drive cattle from Texas to Kansas — something from the Old West heritage of Texas. But few people really know what the trail was, where it went, and how it began.

Texas Christian University historian Dr. Donald Worcester has written this short history of the trail for the Star-Telegram as a prelude to the annual Chisholm Trail Round-up, which will be celebrated this year Friday through Sunday with most activities in the stockyards area of Fort Worth's North Side.

Another part of the Round-up is a trail ride in which longhorn cattle from the LS Ranch in Crowley accompany the riders part of the way.

Worcester, an Ida and Cecil Green Distinguished Emeritus Tutor at TCU and former chairman of its history department, is the author of several books, including The Chisholm Trail: High Road of the Cattle Kingdom, (University of Nebraska Press, 1981).

By DONALD WORCESTER
Special to the Star-Telegram

There has been much confusion about the Chisholm Trail, even among the men who followed it.

One may read that Jesse Chisholm drove cattle out of Texas over it, or that it was named for Texas cowman John Chisum, or that it went through Dallas, or that it crossed the Red River at Doan's Store.

None of these is true.

The trail was, in fact, named for a half-Cherokee trader, Jesse Chisholm, whose main post was in Kansas where Wichita was later built. From there, his wagons carried trade goods south for about 225 miles into Indian Territory in the vicinity of Anadarko.

Some people think that his name should apply only to that part of the trail, but Texas cowmen who followed "Chisholm's Road" gave his name to the entire trail from San Antonio to Abilene, Kan., and other Kansas railheads. Modern U.S. 81 follows the Chisholm Trail fairly closely from San Antonio through Fort Worth to Newton, Kan.

The earlier Shawnee Trail went from San Antonio through Dallas, crossed the Red River at Preston, and continued through the Indian Nations to Sedalia, Mo., or Baxter Springs, Kan. The later Western Trail left the main route at Belton, passed by Fort Griffin, crossed the Red River at Doan's Store and continued to Dodge City.

The Chisholm Trail was not a single narrow lane but many parallel trails, for when there were many herds moving north, they had to spread out 10 or 15 miles on either side to find grass. The herds converged at river crossings and watering places. More cattle traveled over the Chisholm Trail than any route in the world.

During the Civil War, many Texas ranchers and cowboys served in the Confederate Army or frontier units, and their untended cattle increased and scattered without benefit of branding iron.

Many found refuge in brasada, or brush country between the Neuces and the Rio Grande, mixing with wild Spanish cattle and becoming wilder and warier than deer.

Returning cowmen organized "wild cow hunts" to gather and brand cattle and rebuild their herds. They soon had marketable cattle but no place to sell them. In the middle 1850s, Missouri and Kansas had banned Texas cattle because of the devestating tick fever they carried.

In 1866 a quarter of a million cattle were driven out of Texas, but few were sold profitably. Bands of armed men turned back herds at the Kansas and Missouri borders, in some cases scattering or stealing the cattle. A few herds skirted the settlements and reached markets, but they were the minority. Grown steers sold to the hide factories brought only three dollars each. Texas cowmen measured their poverty by the number of cattle they owned.

There was, nevertheless, a great demand for beef in the East. During the Civil War, the raising of beef cattle declined in the East, while the growth of manufacturing industries made it possible for more and more families to buy beef instead of pork. In Texas there were millions of cattle for which there was no accessible market. A number of men tried to devise ways to fill the eastern demand with Texas cattle.

One of these was Joseph G. McCoy, a young Illinois cattle dealer. The Eastern Division of the Union Pacific, later the Kansas and Pacific Railroad, had pushed across Kansas as far as Salina. McCoy took the train west in search of a suitable place for shipping cattle that was beyond the quarantine line. He chose the hamlet of Abilene, Kan., where cheap land was available. Railroad officials agreed to build a siding for 100 cattle cars and to pay McCoy one-eighth of freight charges collected on each carload of cattle. On July 1, 1867, McCoy began building pens and loading chutes.

To inform cattle owners about his enterprise, McCoy sent riders to Indian Territory, where some men were holding herds, and to Texas. He also mailed handbills and ads to Texas towns and newspapers. By mid-August a herd that northern cattlemen had bought in Indian Territory was grazing near Abilene, waiting for the pens to be ready.

The first herd that came directly from Texas belonged to Colonel O.O. Wheeler and partners, who had planned to winter in Kansas and continue on to San Francisco. They bought 2,400 steers at San Antonio and hired 54 well-armed cowboys to protect the herd against Indians. In Indian Territory, they followed Jesse Chisholm's wagon road.

When they learned of the railhead at Abilene, Wheeler's partners insisted on selling the herd there. Dan Waggoner and other North Texas ranchers also sent herds, so that about 35,000 head were shipped that first season. Because of the fear of the tick fever that accompanied longhorns, their profits were small.

In 1868, 75,000 head of the Texas cattle reached Abilene, and the number doubled each year until 1871, when 600,000 head swamped the market. About half of them couldn't be sold and had to be wintered on the plains. Severe ice storms killed about 250,000 of these cattle, and Texas cowmen suffered heavy losses. By this time, however, the many new military posts and the Indian agencies were creating a new demand for Texas cattle.

Men who planned to trail a herd north visited ranches in the fall and contracted for a certain number of steers to be delivered at a central point at a certain date in the spring. Then they lined up a trail boss, cook and chuck wagon, 10 or so cowboys, and a wrangler.

Also needed were five or six horses per man. These were assembled about a week before the cattle were due to arrive, for the horses were usually half-broken mustangs that cost little but were more than adequate for the long drive.

After the cattle arrived and were accepted, each had to be marked with the new owner's road brand to distinguish them from other cattle along the way. A few strays were likely to join any herd, and if no one claimed them, the trail boss allowed them to remain. No Texan, after all, ever ate his own beef.

Col. Wheeler had hired 54 cowboys to trail the first herd up to Abilene, but the large number was partly for defense. After the techniques of trailing large herds were mastered, an experienced trail boss with a cook, wrangler and about 10 cowboys could deliver 2,500 steers to a railhead in Kansas for 60 to 75 cents a head.

The trail boss was in complete command, and the success of the drive depended on his ability. He had to ride far ahead each day to check on water and grass, to select the place to stop at noon and to bed the herd at night. There were treacherous rivers to cross, and quicksand beds and deadly gypsum water to be avoided. Watering a huge herd so that every animal drank only clear water was one of the necessary skills.

Next in rank to the boss was the cook, for the contentment of the hands depended on his ability to serve hot and reasonably tasty meals regardless of the weather or other conditions. Cowboys treated the cook with respect — no one but a fool argues with a mule, a skunk or a trail cook.

The trail crew was divided into point men, flankers, swing men and drags. The pointers were the two most experienced men; they rode on each side of the lead steers. Back of them were pairs of flankers and swing men; bringing up the rear were the drag riders.

When the boss signaled a turn to the right, the men on that side pulled back away from the herd, while those on the left moved in close. The result was that the entire line of cattle, which might be a mile in length, swung to the right, pivoting on the drag end. The sore-footed drag cattle were thus saved unnecessary walking and turning. The success of any drive depended on all of the cattle, even the drags, arriving in good condition.

The drag riders were usually novices, and theirs was the most disagreeable position of all. A cloud of dust visible for miles hung over a moving herd, and the drag riders rode in thick dust all day. They had to keep any cattle from falling behind or straying, but they couldn't make them trot to catch up, for trotting cattle lost weight. A well-managed herd never took a step in any other direction than toward its destination, and no animal moved faster than a walk.

The trail drive was not a drive. A herd was grazed north, making from 12 to 15 miles a day unless it had to go farther to reach water. The cattle grazed off the bed ground until satisfied, then walked steadily along until stopped at noon. Before the herd was bedded down at night, it was allowed to graze again, and it was watered. Steers that had eaten their fill and satisfied their thirst weren't likely to stampede.

When the cattle were bedded down, the night guard began. Two men circled the herd in opposite directions for two hours, when their relief took over. The men rode the same shifts every night, so they automatically awakened when their turns came. They learned to tell time by the Big Dipper, which Mexican vaqueros (cowboys) called "the clock of the Yaquis."

At about 4 in the morning, the cook banged on the pots and pans, which meant that breakfast was ready. The wrangler brought in the remuda of saddle horses and penned them in a rope corral. The cowboys, after but four hours of sleep, put on their hats, pulled on their tight boots and ate breakfast.

(If the weather was bad and the cattle restless, every man might be in the saddle all night. Whether or not anyone slept, the wagon and herd moved in the morning. Lack of sleep was the main complaint on the trail. Trail hands were advised to do their sleeping in the winter.)

A number of towns on or at the end of the Chisholm Trail benefitted enormously from the cattle drives, but most of them for only a few years.

Abilene was a boom town until 1871, when the farmers of Dickinson County bluntly advised Texas trail bosses to dispose of their cattle elsewhere. Over the years, Ellsworth, Newton, Wichita and Caldwell became railheads, and for a time each was a terminus for the Chisholm Trail.

Fort Worth, because of its location, benefitted longer than any other town on the trail except San Antonio.

When the Civil War ended, Fort Worth was a deserted village with more houses than people, for the population had shrunk to about 250 people of all ages. When K.M. Van Zandt arrived, the empty town made "a gloomy picture." It had a blacksmith, a flour mill and a cobbler shop, but neither post office nor saloon.

When the Chisholm Trail opened, Fort Worth was ideally located because it was the last place to lay in supplies for the rest of the drive to Central Kansas. Merchants quickly expanded their stocks; by 1868 the population had doubled. Hell's Half Acre, a collection of saloons, gambling houses and dance halls around the intersection of Rusk (Commerce) and 12th streets, sprang up to entertain trail crews. Fort Worth was known as a "tolerant town."

Rumors that a railroad would soon reach Fort Worth attracted many, and the population grew rapidly by 1873. The financial panic of that year caused a suspension of work on the Texas & Pacific Railroad at Eagle Ford, 30 miles east of Fort Worth. The town's population quickly declined to about 1,000, and "grass literally grew in the streets. This was not a metaphor to indicate stagnation," editor B.B. Paddock of the Democrat wrote, "but a doleful fact."

The Dallas Herald reported that Fort Worth was so quiet a man saw a panther sleeping in the street near the courthouse. In Dallas, thereafter, Fort Worth was known as "Panther City."

The trailing of cattle through Fort Worth continued. The railroad finally reached the city in 1876, and some cattle were shipped by rail each year, but it was far more economical to trail them to Kansas, and they arrived in better condition.

By the time that the trailing era ended, railroads had reached most parts of the cattle kingdom, and railroad cattle cars replaced cattle drives. In 1876 refrigerated railroad cars had been perfected, so that chilled beef could be shipped East instead of live animals. But it was not the railroads that caused the end of the cattle trails.

In the middle 1870s barbed wire had been invented, and in 1876 John W. "Bet a Million" Gates had demonstrated to dubious Texas cowmen in San Antonio that a barbed-wire fence could hold longhorns. Ranchers began buying the state lands their cattle grazed and fencing them with barbed wire.

Farmers of the Plains states also fenced their land as they pushed westward. By 1884 the Chisholm Trail was closed. By then the railroads were finally competing for the cattle trade by offering more reasonable freight rates.

The end of the Chisholm Trail didn't mean that Fort Worth's involvement in the cattle business was over. It was a rail center, and it was headquarters for cowmen of North and West Texas. In the 1890s packing plants were opened, and they contributed to another increase of the city's population.

Pioneer Days set for Sept. 24-26

Fort Worth will return to its roots next month, digging through layer after layer of modern life until it hits . . . yup, you got it, pardner . . . Pioneer Days.

The 23rd annual celebration is scheduled Sept. 24 to 26, and the theme for the three-day event is "Uptown in Cowtown." It will feature dancing, cooking and gunfighting. Of course, that last activity will be much more good-natured — not to mention much less fatal — than it was in the real pioneer days.

One of the major attractions will be the Old Time Fiddlers Contest, hosted by renowned fiddler Johnny Gimble. In addition, a variety of bands and dance groups will perform throughout the bash, including the Fort Worth Symphony Pops Orchestra, a Fifth of Schola, Ballet Concerto and Ballet Folklorico Azteca. And, to round out the musical entertainment, a free street dance with live bands is scheduled both Friday and Saturday evenings on Exchange Avenue.

For those who prefer running to dancing, the festivities will include the Stockyard Stampede early Saturday morning. The 4.4-mile run is sponsored by the American Cancer Society and the North Fort Worth Bank. Proceeds will go to the American Cancer Society.

On Friday night, the Professional Cowboy Rodeo Association will perform at the Cowtown Coliseum. The following night, the coliseum will be the site for a less rugged event: The Pioneer Days Queen will be crowned there.

The Pioneers Day Parade begins at 4 p.m. Sept. 25. Tarrant County Judge Mike Moncrief and his wife Rosie will be the grand marshals, leading hundreds of wagons, bands and horses through the stockyards area. Parade entries will be judged for their originality by longtime residents of the North Side.

Family activities will include an area for children, where they can play games, compete in races and paint their faces. The Fort Worth Firefighters Hose-Off will cool the participants, while gunfights will add a touch of western excitement. Food booths will be strung along the area for those who need to nourish themselves between activities.

Parking will be available at the Tandy Center Subway Parking Lot, with round-trip transportation provided for 25 cents. In addition, the regular Stockyards Trolley will run from downtown to the stockyards area. Cost is 60 cents per ride.

The annual celebration is sponsored by the North Fort Worth Business Assocation, KXAS-TV and the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce.

Thousands flock to Pioneer Days

By BRYAN HORI
Star-Telegram Writer

Several thousand people descended Saturday on the Stockyards to enjoy the second of three days of the 23rd annual Pioneer Days celebration.

The Stockyards took on the look of the Old West. Motorized traffic was absent except for old-time cars that trundled over the red brick roads during the half-hour late-afternoon parade. People of all ages lined East and West Exchange Street for a glimpse of the procession and its 150 entrants.

Although gentle breezes kept the temperatures comfortably in the 80s, beer sales were described by one salesman as brisk.

The crowd Saturday represented the comfortable coexistence of the gunfighter days and modern society. Designer jeans were almost as numerous as faded Levi's. Cowboy boots barely outnumbered tennis shoes, although cowboy hats far outnumbered the colorful metal spring antennae. Children and teen-agers lined up two-deep waiting for turns on video games.

The day was not without its problems, as security officers reported a handful of crimes believed to be related to consumption of alcohol.

Several people were arrested by late Saturday afternoon for fighting and public intoxication. One person said he was cut by a knife when a man lunged at him, and at least three people were arrested for illegal possession of firearms. One woman was transported to a Fort Worth hospital early Saturday morning after she was injured trying to break up a scuffle between her escort and another man.

Duane Selman, director of medical services for the celebration, reported several injuries Friday night and early Saturday morning. He said he was retaining 28 first-aid workers to serve the four-square-block area in anticipation of more alcohol-related incidents Saturday night. He said he expected it to be a "heavy duty night" for his medical team.

Sunday's souvenir, craft and epicurean offerings are scheduled to begin at noon. Special events for the day include a pool tournament at 1 p.m. at 300 W. Exchange St., barbecue cookoff judging at 2 p.m. and fiddling and picking competitions throughout the afternoon in the animal barns.

23rd Pioneer Days hopes to rope in 200,000 visitors

More than 200,000 visitors from throughout the state are expected to descend on Fort Worth's Stockyards as this year's Pioneer Days celebration gets under way Friday.

Included in the three-day event will be enough Western activities, music and arts and crafts for everyone from the country hayseed to the most cunning city slicker.

The 23rd annual event is sponsored by the North Fort Worth Business Association, the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce and KXAS-TV.

Among the more colorful exhibitions will be Saturday's parade over the red brick streets of the area. County Judge Mike Moncrief and his wife, Rosie, are scheduled to lead the parade.

The Pioneer Days Arts and Crafts Show will be from 10 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. Saturday and from noon to 6 p.m. Sunday in the Livestock Exchange Building. All work displayed will be for sale, according to Ruth Ann Kearley, head of publicity for the event. A limited number of booths are still available.

Also, Mrs. Kearley said that young cowboys and cowgirls who ride their stick horses into Tiffany's Ice Cream Parlour Sarsaparilla Bar at 6 p.m. Friday will receive a Wild West peace offering of sarsaparilla, milk and certificates officially making them "ornery cowpokes."

For the first time, an invitational arts and craft show has also been scheduled as part of the celebration. Displays, which will be available for purchase, will include paintings, etchings, water colors, bronzes, woodworks, jewelry and engravings. The free showing will be from 6 to 10 p.m. Friday on the porch of the Livestock Exchange Building.

Because hitching posts and water troughs may become scarce in the traffic congestion, round-trip shuttle bus service for 25 cents from the west Tandy Center subway parking lot to the Stockyards and back will be available from 6 p.m. Friday to 1 a.m. Saturday; from 2 p.m. Saturday to 1 a.m. Sunday; and from noon until 6 p.m. Sunday. Pioneer Days to open at FW Stockyards

FORT WORTH — Producing a mouth-watering steak is a feather in any backyard barbeque chef's cap, but getting a prize for outdoor grill expertise is even better. Cooks can compete in a pit fight for the best barbeque in the first annual Pioneer Days Barbeque Cook-Off here Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 25-26.

The cookout extravaganza, sponsored by Budweiser and Ben E. Keith Co. of Fort Worth, is part of the 23rd annual Pioneer Days celebration held in the National Historic Stockyards District.

Set-up time for chef and crew is 10 a.m. Saturday, with a kitchen inspection and starting at 6 p.m. Entries will be judged at 2 p.m. Sunday.

From a field of 10 finalists, three top chefs will be named Pioneer Days Committee Champion, Reserve Champion and Runner-up. The top three winners receive trophies, while the remaining finalists receive plaques. Additionally, trophies will be awarded to the most colorful team or contestant, the cleanest area and most unique pit.

Barbeque chefs may enter at the North Fort Worth Business Association office, 131 E. Excange St., Suite 100B, Fort Worth, or write for an entry form at the same address. Entry fee is $25 and must be received by Sept. 13.

Other Pioneer Days activities will "cook up" some action for spectators and participants alike. Weekend events include fiddlers and queen contests, Fort Worth Pops Orchestra, ballet and Texas Boys' Choir performances, a pool shoot, gunfighters' exhibit, parade.

For more barbeque information, contact Gene Jernigan at 624-1762. For more Pioneer Days information, call Carolyn Snyder at 626-7921.

Judges of pioneer parade bring heritage to duties

Tahmahkera, 55, now an employee at Carswell Air Force Base, said he roped "all the time" as a child. His family was always around quarter horses, said the 31-year resident of Fort Worth.

He will judge the parade in Comanche tribal attire that has been passed through his family for several generations. Tahmahkera will wear a feather bonnet and beadwork handmade by his mother.

L.E. Dodson, 77, traded his first horse in Red Oak at the age of 7. He got $25, which still did not free him from his chores of tending to his family's horses, cotton and corn, he said. Dodson, who said he felt "honored" to be selected as a judge, said he thought the high prices commanded for horses today put them out of reach of young children, depriving them of buying and trading horses as he did as a youth.

Lopez, a longtime rancher in McCulloch and Concho counties, began ranching with his father at the age of 12. At this morning's Pioneer Days kick-off breakfast, he looked like the ranch foreman he is, wearing an outfit of jeans, leather vest, boots, cowboy hat and silver spur-shaped brooch pinned to his checkered shirt.

Mrs. Lucas was a trick rider for 40 years, with performances in Europe and Australia. A native of Nebraska, she came to Texas at 15, eventually moving to Fort Worth in 1924. She performed in the Fat Stock Show and later toured the country. She is one of four women elected to the Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City, Okla., and she has been inducted into the Cowgirl Hall of Fame in Hereford.

During her career, she would lock up her house in the spring and not return again until Christmas, she said.

Budanauro, the farmer-turned-engineer, said his life now is much different from his childhood on his family's land, helping with the animals and cotton and corn crops. He said the last time he saw a barnyard animal was in the Stockyards — from the comfort of his car.

"I hate horseback riding with a passion, but don't tell anyone or you'll ruin my image," he said.

Pioneer Days celebration begins

Art exhibits, street dances and a beauty pageant will highlight Pioneer Days, an annual three-day event at the Fort Worth Stockyards in celebration of the city's heritage.

One of 10 contestants vying for the crown of Miss Pioneer Days will be selected for the honor Saturday night at the Cowtown Rodeo, organizers said.

Tonight's schedule includes dancing and exhibits.

From 6 p.m. to 10 p.m., there will be an exhibition of the works of invited artists on the veranda of the Livestock Exchange Building.

At 6:30 p.m., there will be a "little buckaroo stampede," in which children younger than 8 will be treated to milk or sarsaparilla at Tiffany's Ice Cream Parlour.

From 9 p.m. until 1 a.m., there will be street dances to country-western music. Smithfields will play on East Exchange Avenue, and West Winds will play on West Exchange. There will be no admission charge.

And to quench your thirst from all that dancing, "beer of every color" will be available, since all distributors will be selling their brands at street concession stands, organizers said.

Stockyards area to celebrate Pioneer Days September 24-26

Fort Worth's Stockyards will be the center of activity September 24-26 as this National Historical District celebrates the 23rd Annual Pioneer Days.

"Uptown in Cowtown" is the theme for the three-day event featuring western revelry, classical and ethnic entertainment, a parade with wagons and bands, gunfights and dancing, contests, cowboys and cooking.

This area is home for western flavor and entertainment. Residents and visitors alike will have the opportunity to enjoy the western scene during Pioneer Days. A free street dance with live bands will be held on Exchange Avenued both Friday and Saturday evenings.

Additional entertainment, as well as a variety of food and drink, can be found in the many restaurants, bars and saloons in the immediate area. Country and western provides the sounds for Cowtown, while performances made possible by the Performing Arts Grant Program will bring a touch of "Uptown" to the celebration.

The Fort Worth Symphony Pops Orchastra, A Fifth of Schola, Ballet Concerto, Ballet Folklorico Azteca and the Texas Boys Choir will each perform throughout the three days. This is a cooperative project of the Arts council of Fort Worth and Tarrant County, and the City of Fort Worth.

Sports enthusiasts can participate in the Stockyards Stampede or watch the season-opener at the Cowtown Rodeo. Held early Saturday morning, the Stockyards Stampede is sponsored by the Americna Cancer Society and North Fort Worth Bank. Proceeds from the 4.4-mile run will go to the American Cancer Society.

The Professional Cowboy Rodeo Association will perform for the first time this season Friday evening at Cowtown Coliseum. Saturday night's performance will also feature the crowning of the Pioneer Days Queen.

A pair of unique competitions highlight the festivities at this year's Pioneer Days. A barbeque cook-off will be held Saturday and Sunday with participants from across Texas cooking their way to trophies. At the same time, the - Utley Puckett Pool Shoot—Off, named for a famous pool player, will host area entrants matching their pool-playing skills against one another.

One of the major attractions of the annual Pioneer Days is the Old Time Fiddlers Contest, hosted this year by renowned fiddler Johnny Gimble. Various age categories will be available for both men's and women's divisions.

The 1982 Pioneer Days Parade begins at 4 p.m. Saturday, September 25. The Grand Marshal will lead hundreds of wagons, bands and horses through the Stockyards. Parade entries will be judged for their originality by long-time residents of the North Side.

Family activities include a children's area with face painting, games, handcrafts and races. The Fort Worth Firefighters Hose-Off will cool the participants while gunfights add a touch of western excitement. Many food and game booths can be found, along with an arts and crafts exhibit featuring the works of local artists.

"The Heart of Cowtown," a short slide show on the history of the Stockyards will continuously run in the Auction Arena near the Livestock Exchange Building. Longhorns will be on exhibit during the three days.

Parking is available at Tarrant County Convention Center with round-trip transportation provided for 25 cents. In addition, the regular Stockyards Trolley will be running from

Colorful history

Pioneer Days book traces Cowtown's past

By RAYMOND TEAGUE
Star-Telegram Writer

Color the men rugged and adventuresome, the cattle brawling and the times romantic.

Take the pages out of Fort Worth's past and color them any way you choose.

The Cowtown Historical Coloring Book is just off the presses and will be sold at Pioneer Days Friday through Sunday at the Stockyards.

Featured in the 32-page coloring book are scenes from 1849 to 1982, from drawings of Camp Worth in 1849, Indians hunting wild game in the 1850s, Texas Rangers in 1862, and a stagecoach robbery by notorious outlaw Sam Bass in 1877 to present-day Sundance Square and the annual North Side celebrations Pioneer Days and Chisholm Trail.

The coloring book is an ambitious project of Greenwood Art Studios and the North Fort Worth Historical Society, and more specifically two people. Working on the book since June have been western artist Tom Greenwood and Historical Society President Sue McCafferty.

Greenwood, whose studio is in the Livestock Exchange Building where McCafferty holds down the visitor information center, has carefully researched the times he's drawn, with particular attention to clothing, and the drawings are full of rich detail and character.

THE FRONT and back covers, showing a cowboy on Exchange Avenue, are done in color pencil so as to give a crayon look, Greenwood said. The inside drawings are designed to appeal to children of many ages, with some subjects more difficult to color than others.

McCafferty wrote the captions for the drawings, a job that required much checking and rechecking and telephone calling to be sure dates, names and events are correct. She said she spent as long as two hours on one three-line caption.

The two separately have been interested in producing a coloring book for years — Greenwood in a western book and McCafferty in an historical book — and the two recently discovered each other's interests and decided to run with the idea.

"We're not doing this for the money involved," McCafferty said. "We'd like to reach the children. They are our future and we will be their past.

"We want to get them interested now and not wait until they are 40 years old. So many things have been lost because we middle-aged people were not interested in historical preservation . . . If we can get the kids interested today and if they will remain interested in the history of Fort Worth, then we won't lose anymore."

Greenwood, too, said he's excited about the book because it's a way to get others interested in Fort Worth's history.

"The history down here (Stockyards) is just fabulous," he said. "I just like that nostalgia. You get to walking around down here and see where things happened and it really excites you."

GREENWOOD SAID the book will be perfect for preschools and elementary schools.

"We have tried to do just enough history to tease their minds so they will want to get more involved in researching history of Fort Worth," McCafferty said, "or at least so they will ask their moms and daddies and they in turn will look up the history for them."

The book's originators see its popularity extending beyond the children. "Adults will take the book as a collector's item," McCafferty predicted. "You're going to find the front and back covers framed in homes and offices.

"I think the covers are going to bring out the child in the adult. His artwork is so much better than what you'll find in most coloring books."

They also see the book as going beyond Fort Worth's boundaries, to be used by Fort Worth promotional groups, travel agencies and airlines to entice people to come sample the city's western heritage.

To show how excited the two are about the coloring book, "We even have it as a first edition," McCafferty said. "I've never seen a first edition coloring book. First Edition, Volume One."

The first printing will be 15,000 copies.

Cost of the book is $2.50. After Pioneer Days, the book will be available through the Historical Society (625-5082). The book probably will be sold by some stores in the Stockyards area, as well as throughout the city, but McCafferty and Greenwood say they've been too busy getting the book to the printer's to think about marketing.

"I think there is a lot of possibilities for the book," Greenwood said. "There isn't anything like it."

The Stockyards history will be spotlighted this weekend during Pioneer Days, sponsored by the North Fort Worth Business Association, Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce and KXAS-TV, with proceeds to be used for the restoration and beautification of the Fort Worth Stockyards National Historic District.

Activities will include staged gunfights, street dancing, old-time fiddlin', the Cowtown Rodeo, a parade, children's events, an arts and crafts show, and entertainment by the Fort Worth Symphony "Pops" Orchestra, Ballet Concerto, Ballet Folklorico Azteca, A Fifth of Schola, and the Texas Boys Choir.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF KELLER

DAN McBRIDE

First Baptist Church holds Centennial

One hundred years is a long time, no matter if it marks the life of a human being or that of a church. When a church survives for a century in the same community, a rich heritage of service and historical memorabilia belongs to members and non-members alike.

Though little is known of its infancy, records show that life for First Baptist Church of Keller began in 1882 with only twenty members to take note of its humble beginnings. The site of its origin was located somewhere on Bear Creek near the vicinity of Elaine St. and Bear Creek Road. Worship services were held in a building that had been erected as a "school house," with church privileges granted.

The church reserved a place for itself in history when it met with eleven other churches on Oct. 14, 1968 to form what is now known as the Tarrant Baptist Association. Lifeblood from the original church still flows in First Baptist Church's veins today where sixth-generation decendants remain active in its membership.

Though relocating twice before moving to its present location, the church has been alive and well on the corner of Jessie and Lorine Streets since 1964. Rev. Thomas E. Merritt is pastor of the congregation today, and a continuing growth in membership is making it necessary to expand the "bulging at the seams" facililties son.

The Centennial Celebration begins March 21 with a series of events and services to take place on that day. Other scheduled activities will be announced at later dates. Former pastors will be speaking at all services. Rev. Noah Phillips will be preaching at 8:30 a.m.; Rev. Daymun White at 11 a.m., and at 2 p.m. Rev. Donald Johnson will bring a challenge to the church. Special music will highlight the day's activities and Dan McBride, well-known humorist, preacher will entertain during the 2 p.m. service.

Immediately following the 11 a.m. service, a meal will be served in the Keller High School cafeteria for members and guests.

The community and past members are invited to join FBC in its 100th birthday celebration.

Keller's First Baptist Church celebrated its Centennial in 1982.

First Baptist Church a century old

The First Baptist Church of Keller, which has grown from its original 20 members to more than 1,000, celebrated its 100th anniversary Sunday.

Four of the 45 pastors who filled the pulpit of the church during its first century participated in the Sunday observance. They were Rev. Thomas Merritt who has been pastor only a short time; Rev. Noah Phillips, who delivered the sermon at the 8:30 a.m. service; Rev. Damon White, who spoke at the 11 a.m. service; Rev. Don Johnson, who conducted the 2 p.m. recognition service which featured an address by Rev. Dan McBride, minister and humorist.

Other well-known former ministers of the church are the late Dr. Marion Morehead, who served as a missionary in Japan; Dr. David King, now a missionary in Lebanon; and Rev. J. W. Hutchins, director of evangelism for the Baptist Convention of North Carolina.

Several other special events are planned by the church in observance of its anniversary, including a "generation day" service, and a pageant depicting the history of the church in music and drama.

The First Baptist Church of Keller was actually an offshoot of the Mt. Gilead Baptist Church which was located at Double Springs, a community near the present Twin Springs Housing development. That congregation moved to a school building near what is now Elaine and Bear Creek Drive. When the railroad came to Keller, the Mt. Gilead congregation moved back to the Double Springs area, but 20 members "lettered out" of the church and formed the First Baptist Church of Keller in 1882.

The new church met in the school building until 1887 when the joined Methodists and Presbyterians in sharing the Union Church on an alternating basis until 1909.

By that time the congregation had grown and they decided to build their own church at the corner of Main and East Price, where they remained until 1964, when they bought the land and built the church at the present location.

The church now has 1,072 members, an average Sunday School attendance of 375, and has a youth ministry, a puppet ministry and a women's ministry.

Church marks founding

First worship services 100 years ago

KELLER — A stubborn and determined Baptist church that has refused to buckle under to adversity is marking its centennial.

The First Baptist Church of Keller recently celebrated its founding with special services and is planning other activities later this year to commemorate its 100th birthday.

The five or six church families that are descendants of the original founders will be honored in a centennial celebration in May. This summer, the church will produce a pageant depicting its history, according to Pam Gerth, the pastor's secretary.

The church has had 45 different pastors, seven ministers who were ordained there and two former pastors who were missionaries. The current pastor is Thomas Merritt.

Mrs. Gerth said the church was organized in 1882 by 20 members of Mount Gilead Baptist Church, one of Tarrant County's first churches.

These 20 people split off to move to the present site of Keller to be near the railroad that was coming through and the town that was growing up along the route.

The first church was built near Bear Creek Park and doubled during the week as a schoolhouse, she said.

"Then some years after that original church was built, they began meeting in Union Church (now an independent Baptist church). They shared services with the Presbyterians and the Methodists for some years," she said.

By 1909, the church was so large that it needed its own building, which it erected at the northeast corner of Main and Price streets. This was later torn down for a service station when the church moved again to its present facilities.

"In 1964, we built the first stage of the building we are in now," she explained. The church is now "in the process of constructing our second phase"— an education building.

The future is very bright for the church, especially with the growth in the area, she said.

"We have the best days ahead," she said. "The potential is unbelievable."

Mrs. Gerth said "stubbornness and determination" gave the church the tenacity needed to last so long.

"I believe the church has always seen itself as having a ministry in the community," she said. "We have suffered our ups and downs through the years. We have persevered. The Lord has blessed us."

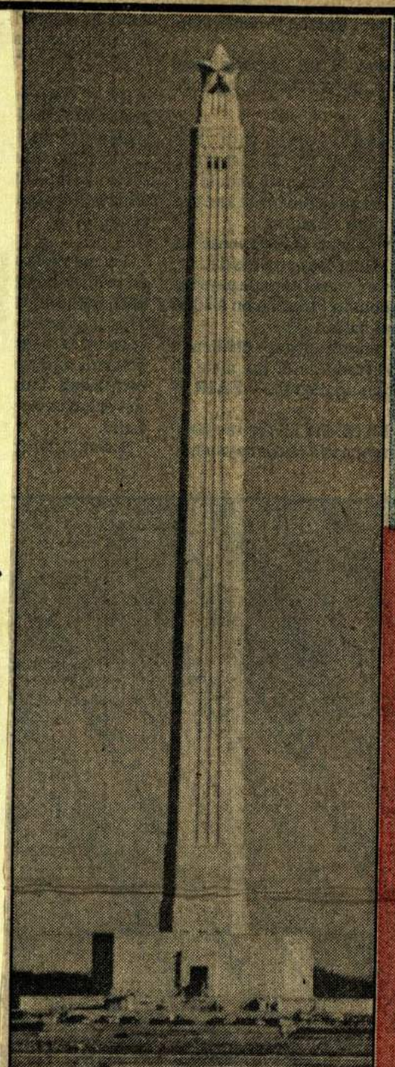
Celebrating Texas Independence



San Jacinto

18-minute battle makes history

By RAYMOND TEAGUE
Star-Telegram Writer

HOUSTON — Sometimes it doesn't take long to make history. The Battle of San Jacinto raged for only 18 minutes on this date in 1836.

Its consequences were of longer duration. The famous battle between the Texan and Mexican armies on a site near the present-day Houston Ship Channel, was the concluding military event of the Texas Revolution.

It won independence for Texas, and that independence later led to annexation by the United States.

The Mexican War that followed resulted in acquisition of most of the United States' present Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast area. That's about one-third of modern America.

"My country will do justice to those who serve her. The rights for which we fight will be reserved and Texas free," wrote General Sam Houston two days before the battle.

He was right, of course. Houston's 927 Americans overwhelmed a force of more than 1,600 under the command of Mexican General Santa Anna. Six hundred and 30 Mexicans were killed, 208 wounded, and the remainder taken prisoners; only nine Texans were killed and 30 wounded.

Houston gave his battle order about 3:30 p.m. during the Mexican siesta. Santa Anna apparently had no lookouts posted. The Texans, screened by trees and rising ground, charged with the immortal cry, "Remember the Alamo!" "Remember Goliad!"

The memory of that battle is a part of the state's and the nation's heritage, but a more tangible remembrance is found in the monuments and markers in San Jacinto Battleground State Historical Park.

Thousands of Texans, Americans and world visitors each year seek out the park, 21 miles from downtown Houston off State Highway 225.

The park consists of 327 acres, including 20 battleground markers and picnic areas, but two attractions take the spotlight: The San Jacinto Monument and Battleship Texas.

The monument is a towering wonder. And, yes, it is taller than the Washington Monument. The Texas-styled obelisk stands 570 feet high; its Washington cousin is a little more than 555 feet. Given well-known Texas pride, wouldn't you know it?

The monument was constructed in 1936-39 with federal and state funds at a cost of about $1.5 million. It is built of reinforced concrete faced with Texas fossilized buff limestone. The museum proper, which forms the base of the building, is 125 feet square.

The museum's four bronze doors boast reliefs of the six flags of Texas. A brief account of the history of the Texas Revolution is engraved on the outside of the base. At the base of the shaft is a frieze depicting significant phases in the Anglo-American colonization of Texas.

The shaft is 47 feet square at its foundation, tapering to 30 feet square at the observation tower. At the apex of the building is a star 35 feet high, weighing 220 tons.

Visitors can just look up and be impressed, or take the elevator 489 feet up to the observation tower for a sweeping view of the territory General Houston's men saw, the ship channel and the many oil refineries that now rise above the flat coastal plain.

The San Jacinto Museum of History is an impressive collection of documents, maps, books, engravings, paintings, photographs, costumes and other memorabilia showing Texas' history from the Indian civilization that Cortes encountered to statehood. On display is one of 12 surviving copies of the original printing of the Texas Declaration of Independence.

Elevator and observation deck are open daily 9:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.; the museum is open the same hours except closed Monday. Admission to the monument and museum is free. Charge for the monument elevator is $1.50 adults and 50 cents children under 12.

The park's second major attraction is the Battleship Texas. The U.S.S. Texas, moored at the battleground since San Jacinto Day, 1948, is the only survivor of the dreadnought class, a veteran of two world wars and many campaigns. The State of Texas was the first state to save its namesake battleship from the scrap heap, and today visitors can climb all over it and almost sense the ship's awesome guns in action.

The battleship is open daily May 1-Aug. 31 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. and Sept. 1-April 30 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission charges are: ages 12 and over, $1.50; 6 to 11, 50 cents; under 6, free.

Across from the battleship and just about as famous is the San Jacinto Inn, founded in 1917 and serving seafood and chicken dinners in an informal, warehouse atmosphere.

The inn is open every Sunday from 1 to 9 p.m. and Tuesday through Saturday from 6 to 10 p.m. Diners must get the whole dinner, which is $16 for adults and $5 for children.

The summer dinner is celery, shrimp cocktail, iced crabs, stuffed crabs, fried tenderloin of fish, fried chicken, French fried potatoes, hot biscuits with strawberry or black cherry preserves, and dessert.

THE GOOD OF WANTING A NOSE

A man who has lost his nose, says an old Scotch journal, has peculiar advantages; he cannot follow his nose, but then he cannot be poking it into everything. He cannot blow his nose, but then he saves pocket handkerchiefs. He cannot be stuffed up in his nose, but then he cannot take snuff, which is, however, another savings. If he goes to sleep, you cannot tickle his nose, and when he is awake, he cannot run his nose against a post. Let him drink what he will, he will never have a red nose; and never be exposed to the nick-name of Nosey; and let him be as impertinent as he will, he may defy you to pull his nose. "Sir," said a man to another with a false nose, "I'll pull your nose." "Sir," said he, "I shall put my nose in my pocket."

The following letter from General Austin to a friend has been handed us for publication, from which it will be seen that he, (Gen. Austin) is before the public as a candidate for President:
Columbia, August 4th, 1836

Dear Sir — I have been nominated by many persons, whose opinions I am bound to respect, as a candidate for the office of President of Texas, at the September elections.

Influenced by the great governing principle which has regulated my actions, since I came to Texas, fifteen years ago, which is, to serve this country in any capacity in which the people might think proper to employ me, I shall not decline the highly responsible and difficult one now proposed, should the majority of my fellow citizens elect me.

My labors and exertions to settle this country and promote its welfare, are well known. My object has been the general good, and the permanent liberty and prosperity of Texas. In the pursuit of this object, I can say with a clear conscience, that I have been honest and sincere in my intentions, and shall continue to be so, whether I am acting as a private citizen, or as a public officer.

I perceive by the proclamation of the President, ordering that the people are requested to say whether they are in favor or not, of annexing Texas to the United States. On this point, I shall consider myself bound, if elected, to obey the will of the people. As a citizen, however, I am free to say, that I am in favor of annexation, and will do all in my power to effect it with the least possible delay.

Respectfully, you fellow citizen,
S.F. Austin

CELEBRATION OF THE FOURTH OF JULY ON BOARD THE SCHOONER PILGRIM

Mr. Editor: — It may not be uninteresting to your readers to learn that the Anniversary of American Independence was celebrated on board the Schooner Pilgrim on the 4th instant, in a truly patriotic manner by the passengers. The following toasts given on the occasion show the hearty good they will entertain for our infant Republic, its people, and institutions.

The present Home of our Families — May peace, plenty, and happiness be their inmates, to wreathe the adopted home we seek for them under the shade of the Texian fig tree.

The Texian Star — In olden times, the wise men of Egypt followed the Star that appeared unto them in the East; at the present day, the wise of the age seek the star that has sprung up in the West.

The Fair Weather and the Fair — who have rendered so pleasant our Pilgrimage.

The Schooner Pilgrim, of Plymouth — May we, like her prototype, the May Flower, be always guided by the Star of Independence, and steered with the rudder of Republicanism without incurring a claim for salvage.

The Cargo of the Schooner Pilgrim — Republican to ferment the dough cakes of Mexico.

The Morning Star of Texas — which beams to the wayfaring Pilgrim as the pillar of fire did to the benighted Israelites in the wilderness.

The Texian Revolutionary Patriots — who fought and bled, and achieved the independence of their homes; they were animated with the same spirit that glowed in the bosoms of the revolutionary Patriots of a sister Republic, where consummating their liberty under the eye and guidance of a Washington.

To Temple of Liberty — More pure than the shrine of Loretto — for within its sacred recess is written the name of Lamar, the Texian Washington, whose sword was ever sheathed with honor, and whose pen was ever guided by principle — a name which, in future ages when the pages of Texian history shall be unclasped to the scrutinizing gaze of the republican votary, will meet the eye as the Pioneer of this country's greatness, the promoter of her fortunes, and the patriot of her councils.

The Battle of San Jacinto — which like the battle of Yorktown, established the rights of man on the broad basis of Liberty and Independence, and taught despots and their slaves that freemen were invulnerable.

Saint Craft and Saint Anna — A precious pair; they were detested in their deaths they ought not to be divided.

The Memory of the Heroes of Goliad and the Alamo — A solitary star in the Texian Firmament is their Cenotaph which throws out its hallowed beams as a beacon light to Texian history.

A City and Commerce of Galveston — May its ports like those of their sister city, New York, soon be crowded with the floating cargoes of every nation.

The Bright Eyes of Texas — They eclipse in brightness the courtly gem of the Queen's garment.

The Ladies of Texas — Their's are the only shrine at which republican patriots bend the knee.

The married Fair of Texas — The Mother of Washington formed the mind of an only son — Mothers of Texas, remember the babe became a man.

The unmarried Fair of Texas — A fairy solace to soothe the hard fare of bidding farewell the affair of Bachelorism.

The Hunters of Texas — True grit to the back-bone and the go-a-head principle.

Ladies Sometimes Gamble, and Wear the Breeches

We see by an exchange paper, that a story has been published in New York about a certain lady who was in the habit of frequenting a HELL in the lower part of the city, in disguise — and who was said to have lost $1,500 or $2,000 there. The truth of the matter was doubted at the time, but an adventure recently occurred that tends to confirm the belief that the fair sex do occasionally, and on the sly, indulge in the beautiful passion of gambling. For some weeks past, a man of youthful appearance, wearing mustachoes, was to be seen as an occasional visitor, to a well known house in Park Row, where he played with various success, but for moderate stakes. At length, on a night, a week or two ago, he tendered a check for $200 to the banker, and in an undertone requested counters. It had been remarked that he scarcely ever spoke but in the same subdued manner. As he was recognized a frequent visitor, and appeared respectable, his request was at once complied with, and for a time, fortune seemed to crown his speculations. At last, however, luck turned, and he lost all. His agitation had been continually increasing, and on losing his last counter, he dropped senseless on the floor. He was immediately carried into a private apartment, where every humane attention was paid to him, and proper restoratives applied, but he relapsed from one fit to another, and, at last, on unbuttoning his vest, the man turned out to be a woman! A medical man was sent for; and at last the young woman was restored to comparative self possession. Consciousness, however, only increased her agitation, for strange to say, she recognized in the medical gentleman a friend both of herself and husband — for she was a married woman! An explanation took place, and it was due to state that the owners of the establishment at once commiserated the situation of the unhappy woman, and without a moment's hesitation, returned the check, which was subsequently admitted to have been signed with the name of her husband.

GEN. SAM HOUSTON is nominated as a candidate for President fo the Republic of Texas — His claim are too well known to make it necessary to repeat them. No man in Texas stands so high in the United States and in Europe.

No man in Texas stands so fair in the estimation of President Jackson and his Cabinet. Consequently no one else can have the same influence in ruging the claims and requests of Texas on the Government of the United States.

No man stands so high in the estimation of the people of Texas -- and his election will produce public tranquility by the destruction of old parties and the excitements spring from them.

Let all good citizens then repair to the polls and give their votes for HOUSTON, and rest assured that in his election the great good of the country will be advanced.

(Signed by more than six hundred persons)
Columbia, August 20th, 1836

P.S. A Handbill, published at Brazoria, denies that Gen. Houston is a candidate, and charges the bringing of him out to a few of Austin's friends. This is not the fact — men of both parties have nominated him, and expresses have been sent to every part of Texas with the news. The people have a right to require the services of General Houston, and if elected he will serve; and that he will be elected his friends entertain no doubt.

A CARD PARTY — It is related of Madame du Deffand, that three of her friends brought a card table to her bed-side, at her request, in her last illness, she taking a hand. As she happened to die in the midst of an interesting game, her partner played dummy for her, and thus the three quietly played it out, and settled the stakes before they called the servants to notify them of the very inopportune demise of their mistress. This is a tough story, but we can believe it, or any other respecting gamblers, which comes within the range fo possibility. Gambling deadens the perceptions of right and wrong, blunts the sensibilities, destroys pity, sympathy, and every other human emotion, and degrades its votaries into demons.

The Strongest Kind of A Team—Alligators in Harness—Zip, my long tails!

They may talk of taming "un-tameable hyenas," of bringing ferocious tigers under subjection and making them as gentle as lambs, and all that sort of thing; but when it comes to breaking alligators so that they will work in harness, we knock under. The invention of steam was a mere circumstance in comparison -- electro-magnetism, even if it is ever brought to such perfection as to assist in turning a windmill in a gale, would be a minor consideration -- but to the story.

The captain of a steamboat engaged in the Red river trade had informed us, although we are inclined to think he was joking, that a wealthy individual up the way has tamed and trained a couple of alligators so that they will swim in harness and haw and gee about as regular as oxen. So well, indeed, have they been broken that their owner frequently tackles them up, hitches them to a "dug out," and cruises about the bayous and ponds when the waters are too high to admit of his going on horse back.

On a late occasion, while sailing along quietly under the banks of a bayou with his "critters" harnessed in abreast he was seen by a hunter, who sung out.

"I say there! Hallo! drap your dug-out astern, and give me a chance to plug one of them varmints!"

"Don't shooot this way-take care, don't you see I'm after them?" said the owner, as the backwoodsman levelled his rifle.

"I see you are after'em, and you'll see a ball follerin' on the same trail in less than two minits. Look out for yourself, stranger; here goes for a crack at the varmint this way."

"Stop! hold up your rifle. That's my team you're aiming at. Look at the harness, there, just on the top of the water. They are hitched to the canoe, and I am on a little jaunt out back to look at and enter some lands."

"Well, I declare!" said the old hunter, "if that don't beat all the doins I've heered on way in the thick settlements, I reckon you undestand animal magnetism, as they call it, a few."

"I understand training alligators."

Well, you can pass -- hope you have a pleasant excarsion."

The man now stirred up his team, and was soon under way at a rate which would leave a common high steamboat outof sight in no time.

Red Landers generally, and the citizens of San Augustine particularly, have hitherto been considered far in the back ground, compared with many portions of Texas, as to the correct principles, and moral character of their population. In many instances the laws have been tardily enforced, and not infrequently, totally disregarded; our reputation has no doubt been injured in other parts of the Republic through the misconduct of many of our people — by the much to be "depreciated" custom of settling disputes, by quarrels, rows, and street fights — with bowie knives, pistols &c. (which have formerly been conspicuously worn and displayed) — has done more to injure the prospects of this city, and East Texas generally, than any thing else could have done. For the last year, however, this character cannot be applied to the citizens of our section ... Journal and Advertiser

The Ladies, heaven bless their loveliness, have frequently excited our sympathies on the subject of this red soil of ours — the terre rouge, so peculiar to a few counties in eastern Texas. Now we sincerely condole with them on the absence of delicate parlor floors, and likewise for the very great sacrifice of having to dispense, in some degree, with the wearing of white robes, kid gloves, light hosiery, and colored prunellos — this is absolutely distressing, very; moreover, there is with this another grand objection to red lands; There is the contrast between the complexion of our soil and the rosy complexion of our interesting and beautiful ladies, young and old, we make no distinction. We would not for the world intimate that their pretty faces are rouged over with the red dust that is raised about our streets so plentifully during the dry weather, not at all; — we acknowledge, however, that they have not the slightest use for that kind of material termed rouge, and why? Because they live in a section of country, the most conducive to health in the world, where a pure atmosphere, wholesome water, and productive soil, combine to render them healthy, happy, lovely, and beloved.

We do not wish to cause the slightest feeling of envy in the bosoms of any of our fair readers who are located near or in our river towns; we are truly sorry for them, and regret that so many pretty faces should be rendered pale and emaciated by fighting musquetoes and ague and fever; and we invite them most cordially to come and reside with us during the summer months.

100 years in front of the Fort Worth classroom

By BETTY HALL
Star-Telegram Writer

Betty Ward will tell you kindergarten is where the action is. Mabel Anderson begs to differ. But 43 years of teaching first grade might have left her a bit prejudiced. Almena Johnson says she would not trade her "100 years" at Poly High for anything.

The Fort Worth Independent School District is 100 years old this year, and although neither Johnson or Ward or Anderson have been around quite that long they seem to typify those teachers who served the district in its early years and spent a significant portion of their careers in it.

Through normal schools and teacher rules, depression and tornadoes, Red Cross gift boxes and world wars, polio and drug epidemics, teachers have been the translators who helped each of us understand ourselves, each other and world. Times have changed, but, essentially, they have not. For them it has been a labor of love.

In 1886 teachers found that more was required of them than simply imparting knowledge. That year's Superintendent's Rules for Teachers listed these duties: 1. Wash windows once a week; 2. Clean classroom with soap and water once a week; 3. Check outhouses daily. With the last there was the notation that "plenty of old catalogues are available at the school board office."

Today's instructors would have had some difficulty complying with the 1886 Dress Code. Women teachers were not allowed to wear — at any time in public — bathing suits, bloomers for cycling, skirts slit to expose ankles and bustle extension over 10 inches.

Men could not wear detachable collars, had to wear a neck tie, could not wear shirt sleeves unlinked and rolled, and had to keep their hair closely cropped.

Conduct resulting in immediate dismissal were smoking of cigarettes, use of "spirits", frequenting of pool halls or dance halls or joining of any feminist movement such as Suffragettes.

By 1910, when monthly salaries had reached $16, rules for conduct had modified only slightly. Women teachers were warned not to keep company with men, to be at home between 7 p.m. and 6 a.m. unless attending a school function, not to loiter downtown in ice cream stores, not to travel beyond the city limits without the permission of the school board chairman, not to dress in bright colors, not to dye their hair, not to ride in a carriage or automobile with a man not a father or brother, and to wear at least two petticoats. riding was forbidden into the '20s. Prohibition against a female teacher marrying didn't expire until the early 1940s.

An earnest desire to teach and a passing grade on the teacher's certification exam were the early and only requirements. Many teachers began at age 16 or 18 and walked into schoolrooms where several of the pupils were bigger and older than they. One ex-teacher claims that the educational philosophy she learned from a Methods text is still in present-day texts, dressed up in different words, sometimes presented as a new discovery.

By the early 1920s, Fort Worth had begun to absorb the small independent school systems that surrounded it. One system, Benbrook's, initiated a feisty red-haired young lady, Beulah O'Kelly — later Beulah Bratton — into the fun and surprises of teaching.

First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt had planned a private visit to her son, Elliot and his wife Ruth Googans Roosevelt when they lived in an area of Benbrook known as Dutch Branch. Through friends, a visit was also arranged for the school nearby where Mrs. Bratton was the teacher-principal.

Wearing her one and only good dress and pearls, the teacher waited anxiously through two days for the visit that didn't materialize. The third day she gave up and wore an old print dress and an ugly green smock. Naturally, Mrs. Roosevelt came that day. Mortified by her attire, Bratton tried to stay in the background. Nevertheless, after a pleasant visit, the president's wife turned to leave and said, "I certainly like your dress, dear. It reminds me of the Texas prairie."

Bratton's 44-year career included a lengthy stay at Stripling Junior High where her journalism products became famous.

VIVIAN PICKARD, former Diamond Hill science teacher, remembers the consolidation period as a time when parents resisted losing direct control. Speaking of her memories of the Poly, Niles City and Diamond Hill ISDs', she recalled statistics that indicated that at one time the Diamond Hill area paid the largest amount of school taxes in the United States. Before its inclusion in the Fort Worth system, the Diamond Hill home economics department was proud of its set of Haviland china. Fort Worth was apparently as pleased with the china as with the Diamond Hill school. Upon consolidation, a truck was sent to transfer the dishes to Central, now Paschal High School.

Hazel Peace, teacher at I.M. Terrell for 47 years, has seen perhaps a greater degree of progress than most: the 1954 desegregation decision, equal opportunity, access to facilities. Black students from Mansfield to Parker County were accustomed to busing — Terrell was the only high school available to them. Black debate students doing research in the Fort Worth Public Library were not permitted to sit down, nor could they check out the books. Peace remembers that Ella May Shamblee brought books from the library to the old YMCA for them and that Texas Christian University allowed them the use of its library as though they were students.

Ask teachers to describe the best part of their jobs. They'll always tell you about their kids. Kindergarten teachers insist that age is best. High school teachers wouldn't be anywhere else. To judge from their stories, the challenge is in the understanding.

First graders are the best according to Marguerite Atwood, former South Hi Mount teacher. One student told her, "You're just like my mother." Many are the carefully illustrated momentos and notes, "I love you, Miss Atwood." And the smiles:

"Miss Atwood, I forgot my support card."

"Joe, I can't figure out why you're acting like this."

"I'm like you Miss Atwood. I can't figure it out, either.'

One first grader who saw the principal delivering his teacher's check asked incredulously, "Miss Reece, do you get paid for this?"

Georgia Willis, American History teacher at Carter-Riverside for 26 years, remembered the year the school annual was dedicated to her. She paid no attention to friends who encouraged her to dress up and get her hair fixed to have her school picture taken. "When the annual came out, I was really surprised!" she recalled

JULIUS TRUELSON, former Fort Worth superintendent, also remembered his Carter-Riverside days with pleasure. As math teacher and coach, he earned $150 monthly — $100 for teaching, $50 for coaching. Leading "reluctant" learners into a knowledge of math was a task he seemed to relish. One project took many weeks and involved calculating the cost of a trip by car to any destination the student chose. Figuring the distance to the destination and back, the cost of the gasoline, the expense of an overnight stay, the cost of food — all was so interesting to one girl that she told him, "This is the most fun math class I've ever had and we don't even do math!"

Truelson also had a story about how Fort Worth's first school annual containing all the students' pictures was produced. Most students couldn't afford to have their pictures taken for the annual. Consequently, few were bought, for the students didn't have the $3 price either. A photographer agreed to take all the students' pictures if he could sell pictures back to those interested. A coat and tie was provided for the boys. All were photographed. The next problem was solved by permitting the students to set up savings accounts, depositing 25 cents a week beginning in September. The bookkeeping class kept the records and by the time the annuals were published, all had been sold and paid for.

Probably no events were ever funnier than the Christmas Pageant mishaps: Joseph's missing beard — hooked on the wing of a passing angel; the little angel who slipped from the stage to go to the bathroom and was followed by the entire angelic chorus.

Two illustrate the "when everything can go wrong" theory. In one pageant, Joseph's crook broke, toppling him to the floor. He had gone to sleep. On the same night, Mary stubbed her toe as she stepped onto the stage and fell, breaking the Baby Jesus. The show went on, but Mary cried all during the performance.

Schools launch new era

History offers a solid base

By LINDA PONCE
Star-Telegram Writer

Harold Graves entered school in 1912, before Fort Worth annexed the Polytechnic area where his family lived. He recalls walking through the prairie weeds to elementary school after his parents moved to the newly developed South Side.

Later, to get to Central High School, the only high school on the South Side, Graves rode the streetcar downtown and transferred to the car that ran by the school.

In 1935, Central was renamed for Robert Lee Paschal, who was principal of Central when Graves was a student there. To Graves, Paschal isn't just the name of a high school. It represents a man who helped to build the city's public school system.

"I would think it would be very important to know how they (the schools) developed because what we have today didn't just spring up," said Graves, who grew up with the school system as student, teacher and administrator. "They developed over many years through the work of many, many people."

They were people like Isaiah M. Terrell, who was among the first teachers hired when the Fort Worth public school system began in 1882 through the efforts of then-mayor John Peter Smith. Terrell later became principal of the Negro High School before leaving Fort Worth to become president of Prairie View A&M University in 1915. Six years later, his old high school was renamed in his honor.

And there was Alexander Hogg, the first school superintendent, who held the post three different times, lobbied to have black and white teachers paid equally, even though their school systems were separate until the 1960s.

"We find there are people who don't find this fascinating," said Bil-

Fort Worth schools step into new century

ly Sills, centennial celebration chairman for the Fort Worth schools. "But the big thrust is not the past, but that the past is projecting us into our future."

Fort Worth public school students step into a new century Monday, and school officials plan a year of celebrations to commemorate the district's heritage.

"This century has promise just like the past century had promise," Sills said. "We're saying we have a past, and we're ready to go ahead to the future."

Former school board members already were honored in August at a trustees meeting attended by four of the five members of the board that was named the country's best under president Loyd Turner in 1967.

Observances will climax with an Oct. 24 citywide birthday party and culminate in a special week for high school graduates in May. Some schools, such as North Hi Mount Elementary, which is 50 years old, intend to celebrate their own anniversaries as well.

Former superintendents and school board clerks will be honored in October. And a history fair Feb. 28-March 4 will focus on important events in the Fort Worth schools.

"We want to emphasize how important it is to write down history as we go," Sills said. "If we don't write it down, we're likely to lose that eventually."

He also hopes "to get youngsters interested in preserving the oral history that's still available," he said.

Graves, who started substitute teaching in Fort Worth in 1931 and then held jobs from teacher to principal to summertime secretary to the curriculum director, said he couldn't single out individuals from the many who contributed to the school system.

"Everybody made a contribution as the city grew and as the schools grew," Graves said. "Each sort of measured up to the challenge of the time."

The increasing complexity of society has put greater demands on the schools, Graves said, but history has provided them with a solid foundation.

"We have a lot to build on. I'm very anxious that our school system meet needs of students, that it be effective and worthwhile. Being a school (system) of all the people, it has to meet lots of needs. It's very important to keep it for the next 100 years and keep making it better all the time."

School history comes built in Fort Worth's public school system celebrates its 100th year this fall

By RAYMOND TEAGUE
Star-Telegram Writer

Students sometimes feel as if they've been going to school for a hundred years.

In Fort Worth, they have. Not individually, of course, but collectively.

The city's public school system was created 100 years ago this month, and the Fort Worth Independent School District has planned a full calendar of centennial events for the 1982-83 school year, which begins Monday.

This fall, various Board of Education, school and community activities will be climaxed by Centennial Celebration Day Oct. 24. Later plans include the school district's History Fair Feb. 28-March 4.

Fort Worth schools have come a long way in 100 years, actually more than 100 years.

Pioneer business and civic leader John Peter Smith opened the first school in Fort Worth in January 1854 in an old army hospital building, but closed it after a short time because of ill health.

After that, wandering tutors conducted classes in homes. From 1856 to the Civil War several different "Male and Female" schools were established by community action, but the war brought all formal educational activities to a standstill.

From the opening of a high school in 1866 by Capt. John Hanna and throughout the 1870s, a number of private schools flourished.

In December 1881, Miss M. Sue Huffman organized a school system and became the first person to bear the title of superintendent of public schools in Fort Worth. The system was short lived, however, because of certain legal entanglements.

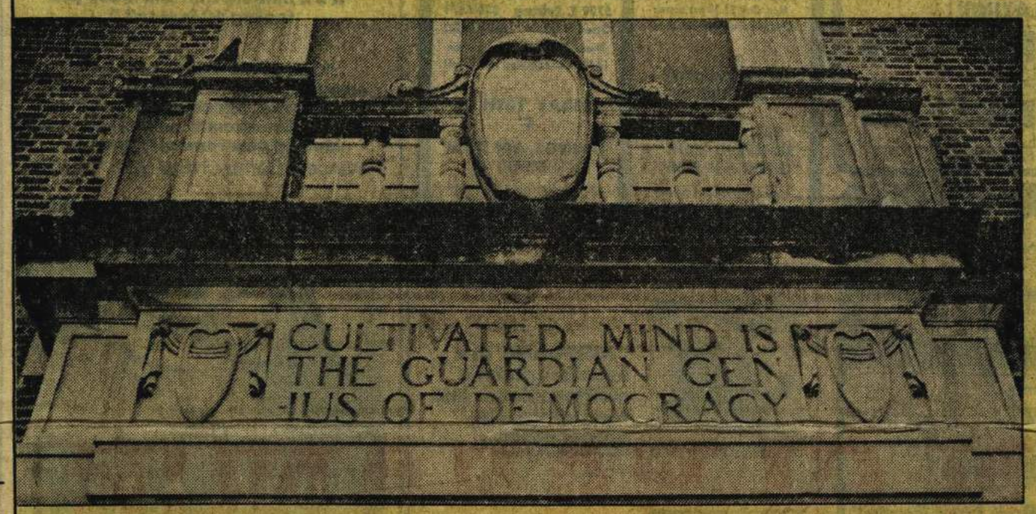
Then, in the summer of 1882, a special census revealed sufficient population to qualify the city, legally, for a public school system; therefore, a ½-cent school tax was levied and the school system was assured. A newly recognized Municipal Board of Education met on Aug. 21, 1882, and advertised for a superintendent. On Aug. 29, the tax vote was favorable, 625 to 18. On Sept. 5, Alexander Hogg was appointed the first superintendent of the permanent public school system covering four square miles in the downtown area. Twenty-one teachers were employed before the end of the year.

Enrollment the first year was 1,258 students. Enrollment reached a peak of 89,088 in October 1970, and has leveled off to around 65,000. Current operating budget is around $160 million under the 17th school

The district has grown from its original seven rented buildings to 108 schools, including 69 elementary, 18 middle, 12 high and nine special schools.

Other special dates in the school district's history, as compiled by Billy W. Sills, program director for secondary social studies, include: Sept. 15, 1884, the first high school organized with 21 students; March 1891, the original Fort Worth High School opened on South Jennings between Jarvis, Daggett and Hemphill; 1909, North Fort Worth and near South Side schools annexed; Dec. 2, 1910, original Fort Worth High School burned; September 1911, new Fort Worth High School opened on Jennings Avenue (now called Ernest Parker); 1922-23, Polytechnic, South Fort Worth, Brooklyn Heights, Arlington Heights, Riverside and other districts annexed; Nov. 14, 1933, bond election passed (also 1941, 1945, 1948, 1952, 1956, 1964 and 1977).

As school opens this year, school officials will be giving extra thought to the past. One way everyone can feel more of a kinship with school times gone by is by observing the many wonderful old school buildings that still stand so proudly throughout the city, visible reminders of a rich heritage. Truly, they don't make them like that anymore — temples of learning fringed with elaborate scrolls, carved words of wisdom, etched designs and art deco columns. Pictured on this page are some of these wonders, but there are many more to be seen as the Fort Worth public school district begins its 100th school year.



Top of page, Arlington Heights High School, 4501 W. Rosedale, was built in 1936 in the Georgian style of architecture.

Documentary on sharecropper celebrates Juneteenth

"God don't go by the color of your skin. Mother always said you fight evil with kindness 'cause there's a better life waitin'. Until then, I'll just keep toilin on."

These words, spoken by 86-year-old Noble Wesley in the opening of a half-hour documentary entitled "Toilin on," sum up the philosophy and creed by which the former sharecropper from Kaufman, Tx., has lived his life.

"Toilin on," airs Saturday, at 9:30 p.m. as part of Channel 13's Juneteenth programming lineup. The program outlines the struggle of the Wesley family.

Footages were filmed in East Texas by Dallas filmmaker Michael Galvis. While researching a documentary on gospel music, the 25-year-old Galvis met Wesley, a deacon of the Macedonia Baptist Church in Kaufman. Galvis was so intrigued by the stories Wesley told him that the focus of his film changed.

"He's a common man who would never get his story told," Galvis said, "but when you listen to him and what he's gone through, you see how fantastic he really is. His whole attitude reflects his inner triumph over racial prejudice."

While "Toilin' on" incorporates much of the gospel music Galvis originally set out to record, the film is a tapestry, richly woven together with Wesley's reminiscences of his upbringing and family and interspersed with his hopes for the future. He speaks fondly of his grandmother, who was brought from Madagascar at the age of 12 and sold into slavery, and of the faith and love for God she instilled in him.

The film explores the impact of the days following the Civil War and explains the importance of Juneteenth — that summer day in 1865 when the slaves in Texas learned they were free. Wesley recalls how he gradually came to realize just what this date meant to his grandmother as he grew older. He talks of the Juneteenth celebrations with their picnics, games, dances and music.

Following their freedom from slavery, black people found a new kind of bondage: sharecropping and tenant farming. Wesley, the son of a sharecropper, spent 54 years as a sharecropper.

Wesley ponders why the black man has had to suffer — why he was abused and why he was hated.

"Black men have been treated bad for a long time, and they've got a long way to go," he says. "But times are changing, and it's going to change here. There are no black people or white people in God's Kingdom 'cause we'll all be what? Angels."

Juneteenth festivities to start Friday at park

The annual celebration of Juneteenth — the day slaves in Texas got the word they were freed — starts Friday at Sycamore Park.

Events for the Juneteenth Ninth Renewal include a golf tournament, battle of the bands, cultural and community information booths, sports tournaments, a Miss Juneteenth Pageant and carnival rides.

Observance of Juneteenth was rejuvenated here in 1974 after about 20 years during which it was downplayed.

The Fort Worth Community Development Fund decided to revitalize the annual celebration as a link between the past and the present in an effort to provide a continuity of traditions of blacks in Texas.

The holiday is the annual observance of June 19, 1865, when Gen. Gordon Grager landed at Galveston and announced the news. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation went into effect almost 2½ years earlier, on Jan. 1, 1863, but did not change the status of about 180,000 slaves in Texas at that time.

More details about the event are available from Jap Jones at 451-2307 or Opal Lee at 335-1866.

BLACK HERITAGE IN THE COMMUNITY

Franklin Moss

The black heritage in Fort Worth developed within the basic fiber of the city itself. Building in an untamed wilderness was the task of both the white frontiersmen and the blacks, although the latter's status was one of servitude. Slavery was one of the first institutions introduced in the little fort community that was located on the Trinity River. Dr. G. M. Standifer was one of the first slave holders in Tarrant County. Colonel Middleton Tate Johnson's plantation of 640 acres had 150 slaves working its fields between 1846 and 1850.

When Tarrant County was created on August 26, 1850, it had a population of 599 whites and 65 black slaves. Each slave was valued at an average of $400.00. In 1856, Paul Isbell, another slave holder and breeder, moved into Fort Worth and located in the area of the present CArswell Air Force Base and by 1860 the slave population had risen to 280.

Fort Worth had adjusted to the system of servitude and had no intention of relinquishing it. The Abolitionist movement in the late 1850's and early 1860's met with much opposition within the city. In 1860 Fort Worth voted to hang all abolitionists. Two white ministers were the first victims of this policy. This action served to effectively prevent any great uprisings by the slaves themselves.

Even though most slaves were considered docile and loyal, there were exceptions such as "Uncle Cato", a notorious black who was swept up in the abolitionist movement. He was said to have been responsible for burning Dallas one Sunday in July in 1860. On the following Monday he was caught and hanged. All slaves within Tarrant County were whipped because of Cato's act.

Between 1860 and 1862, the city was confronted with terrorist activity and threats perpetuated against blacks as well as white abolitionists. After the Civil War, with freedom granted the slaves, Fort Worth met the Emancipation Proclamation with resistence until that posture became economically infeasible to maintain. Otis Isbell, for example, released his 200 slaves from his White Settlement plantation because it became too expensive for him to continue operations. The slaves left without money, land, or knowledge of how to get work.

Ex-slaves became something of a problem. They wandered aimlessly through the county. Such a situation inevitably bred trouble for the community. More Negroes were respectable citizens, but the few malcontents looking for trouble--as well as many who were not--got it in a drastic and reprehensible form--The "KKK"! In 1868, two hundred white-sheeted riders marched through the city whipping, shooting and intimidating black citizens. In 1872, a troop of twenty black northern soldiers was stationed in Fort Worth. Their major duties were to round up Tarrant County voters for a roll call. The black troops stood at the polls for the first free election in Tarrant County since Reconstruction. Three men were elected to the Board of Commissioners. Tony Rucker from Fort Worth was one of the three, and he enjoyed the distinction of being the first and only black elected official in this period.

Blacks also began to serve on the police force in Fort Worth during the late 1860's and early 1870's. John Pratt was the first Negro businessman. He operated a blacksmith shop at what is now Commerce and Weatherford streets, but the white citizens of Fort Worth did not receive him well. Major (K. M.) Van Zandt, a prominent citizen in the city, diminished much of the opposition when he began to take his horses to Pratt's shop.

The public school system in Fort Worth was in its developmental stages when, in 1882, five private schools and one Negro church were rented for public school use. The black teachers chosen were I. M. Terrell, J. W. Johnson, H. H. Butler and T. B. Davis. This was not the first black school in Fort Worth. Butler had been operating a private school for Negroes since 1875. The African Methodist Church had conducted a school for blacks also, with a tuituion of ten cents a day.

Very few records exist of black participation in the city's growth and development. The rare exceptions include accounts of Old Don Hall, Don Daggett, John Pratt and "Old News", who were said to have assisted Ed Terrell and Jesse Burton, both influential white leaders of the City. And yet we do know that Black businessmen were building a small empire on the east side of the city. Not until a black giant, Bill "Gooseneck" McDonald, began his movement to the top of the black community, however, do we begin to have records of black achievements in the city between the late 1890's and the 1950's.

McDonald was the son of a former slave who came to Fort Worth from Kaufman County. He was a noted teacher and a leader of the black Masonic movement. In 1889, W. M. McDonald was also one of the leaders who organized the "Texas Colored State Fair Association" that was held in Fort Worth. He also gained recognition in the Texas Republican Party. His greatest contribution was the establishment of the Franternal Bank and Trust Company in January of 1912. The Bank was located on the northeast corner of 9th and Jones Streets. Jones street became the location for black doctors (most notably Dr. Ransom), hotels and churches.

Black churches such as Mount Gilead Baptist, Second Baptist, Saint James Baptist, and Allen Chapel flourished in the downtown area. There were no balck lawyers in Fort Worth in the early 1900's. In 1920 black entreprenuers, some of whom were former slaves or slave born, began the massive development of a black city on the east side of downtown Fort Worth. Some whites threatened to burn down this area, but the Rev. L. K. Williams was reported to have worked with the black and white businessmen in order to maintain harmonious relations. Blacks were employed in the packing houses and on the railroads. Many black teachers and other black professionals and semi-professionals worked hard to form a rising black middle-class in the city. Many of these blacks moved to the south side on Terrell Avenue in an area that had once been exculsively white, but which gradually began to turn black in an alternating street pattern. Bill McDonald was one of the first blacks to locate on Terrell Avenue during this time.

A number of black newspapers were begun during the first half of this century, but only the Fort Worth Mind and the Fort Worth Como Monitor weathered the storms of time. However, Good Publishing Company was located in Fort Worth and with it came the national distribution of its leading magazine, Sepia.

The early 1950's marked a change in black progress following the slow recovery from the depression, which had been preceded by the rapid expansion of black enterprise in the 1920's. Black businesses failed and amny of the sons and daughters of the formerly successful black businessmen either left the city or did not continue in their parents' footsteps.

In the fifties and sixties the development of black organizations, such as the NAACP, SCLC, SNIC and the later United Front, created a new impetus for black development in the city. Now only remnants of these black organizations remain, yet their existence served as a starting point for further black growth and development. Black companies are beginning to appear again. Superior Tools and A. and O. Processing Company are two of the largest black owned companies in the city at the present time.

On the political front, 1967 saw the election of Dr. Edward Guinn as the city's first black City Councilman. His four year tenure was immediately followed by the now twice elected Leonard Briscoe. Beginning in the mid-fifties, blacks again appeared on the city's police force, and other blacks have followed in high administrative positions. Blacks in Fort Worth are becoming aware once again of their own unique worth and role in the city's history, just as they were in the early 1900's. Their accomplishments are becoming the accomplishments of the city. The black heritage in the city is, as it was from the beginning, a part of all of the achievements made in the city.

The black heritage is written by the efforts of all blacks, whether rich or poor, great or small, working together to make the black role in the city what it is today. Black slaves of the past, as well as the black politicians, professionals and the businessmen of today, have all contributed to that heritage in a manner that is worthy of pride.

WANTED: INFORMATION ON FRANKLIN ST.

Ms. Frances Allen, 2256 Fifth Avenue, Ft. Worth, Texas 76110 is doing research on Franklin St. which is located north and parrellel to West Belknap. It no longer exists as a public street but is located within Herita e Park. At one time it was an important thoroughfare. In the 1907 City Directory (the first Fort Worth Directory to carry a street section) are a number of residences listed in the 200 black. All residents were black. They were: Flora E. Duncan at 206 Franklin who operated a boarding house (She believes that this house--a two story structure still stands). Sepehn Mays and James Dodd were listed as laborers. Walter V. Carter, driver for Keystone Printing Co., and Zinman T. Farmer were listed. She hopes to find some children or grandchildren of these people who might have heard stories about this street and the past. She is particularly eager to document the only two story building which still stands.

LENORA ROLLA

by

LaRae Parks

(Reprinted with permission from the Texas Times issue of April 15, 1982)

Mention the Tarrant County Black Historical and Genealogical Society and to more than a few people the image of Lenora Rolla will come to mind.

And, despite the fact that she tries to remain in the background--forever pushing the organization--it's no wonder that the society almost has become synonymous with the Palestine area native.

Her interest in history goes back over a half a century when she would listen to her grandmother tell about the way things used to be.

The stories told of how her grandmother was separated from her family in South Carolina when she was given to a new "master." They told of the happy days she had spent there (South Carolina).

Mrs. Rolla said her grandmother also told her about the time she tried to walk back to South Carolina, but some of her master's white neighbors returned her to him.

"I was very close to my grandmother. People used to say she'd give her right eye for me," Mrs. Rolla said with a smile explaining the fondness between the two.

Several years would pass before the second seed was planted that had a bearing on her eventual involvement with the hisotrical society.

About 10-15 years ago, a foundation was attempting to locate people who knew when their families had landed in South Carolina. A local television newscaster suggested Mrs. Rolla to the group as someone who might have such information about her family.

In reality, she had no such information, Mrs. Rolla recalled. And, secondly, she wasn't interested in that sort of thing, primarily because it was before the popularity of Alex Haley's "Roots," she stated.

Her first real involvement with the history of Blacks came in the early 1970's as part of a group who was preparing Black history to be included in the Bicentennial celebration in 1976.

Sometime after that, Mrs. Rolla said she started taking courses which trained people to become familiar with dossiers at the Museum of Science and History. That interest later was followed by a desire to become a curator.

Her newfound interest eventually sparked another desire--to compile Black history from 1850 to 1950. Mrs. Rolla soon discovered that there wasn't much information available, especially not in one location.

"I felt like something needed to be done to pull Fort Worth and Tarrant County's Black hisotry together," she said.

She shared her concern with several people and it was decided that a historical society should be formed to take care of the void.

Next month, the society will celebrate its fifth birthday. Mrs. Rolla and other society members are hoping that the group will be able to move from its present location at 1150 E. Rosedale to its larger quarters in the old Boone House at 1020 E. Humbolt.

To finance restoration of the home built by a former pastor of Mount Gilead Baptish Church, the society sought community support through a newspaper drive earlier this year.

Frequently, Mrs. Rolla can be seen dashing from place to place as she tries to get as many of these things done as she can.

A Fort Worth resident for 72 years, she said, she learned a long time ago that "Now is the time to do things."

"I don't like to go to bed tonight leaving a lot to do for tomorrow since tomorrow might not come," she said explaining her philosophy.

Dogs, Weeds and Neglect

Founded by Ex-Slaves, Texas Community Fights for Survival

By SUSAN MILSTEIN, Dallas Times Herald

FORT WORTH—For the emancipated slave families who settled Mosier Valley more than a century ago, the fertile land was their first taste of freedom, the first place they could own farms and establish a church and school.

But for their descendants, who are struggling to resuscitate the dying rural community at the edge of Forth Worth, the taste has turned bitter.

Hundred-acre farms have been whittled down to one- and two-acre plots, and factories stand where cotton once grew.

Dogs rummage through the tall weeds and mounds of trash dumped along the roadsides. Every window pane in the old abandoned school has been shattered, and residents say their mailboxes are knocked down almost as soon as they are put up. People have gotten into the habit of locking their front doors.

Most Mosier Valley residents can trace their roots back to pre-Civil War times and almost everyone is kin to everyone else.

But no one knows how much longer the community or its rich legacy can survive.

Warehouses Spring Up

"Every time you look up, someone's bought another piece of farmland and put a warehouse on it," said the Rev. Lloyd Austin, pastor of Mosier Valley's oldest church, where the motto is "Work Out Your Own Salvation."

"The area's getting so commercial," he said. "God only knows how much longer the residents can hang on."

Some, like 97-year-old Ollie (Daddy) Farrow, say they will never leave. "I decided I'm going to die here," he said.

But he and the others who want to stay must contend with problems that have changed the face of Mosier Valley in recent years. Some try to ignore the illegal dumping, noise and traffic, but others still believe the community's right to city services is worth the fight, a fight they appear to be losing.

"Eventually the people will be forced out and it'll all go industrial," said Tarrant County Constable Bill Brown, who patrolled the Mosier Valley for 15 years and was active in the neighborhood's now-defunct "betterment" council.

'History Out There'

"And that's a shame because that's history out there."

The community that today is home to about 160 people was founded in the early 1870s by 11 emancipated slaves and their families, most of whom had been taken from Tennessee through Missouri to Hurst, Tex., to work on a cotton plantation owned by a man named Mosler. After emancipation, some were given land and others purchased it for about $1.25 an acre.

The former slaves established a close-knit farming community and named it Mosler. In the transition from the spoken to the printed word, the place came to be called Mosier Valley.

The children of the original families intermarried and the land was passed through the generations. Even after World War II, when the surrounding area began to develop, Mosier Valley remained a rural enclave where a person could be born, live and die without ever having to leave.

When Bell Aircraft Corp. opened a plant in 1951 on the site of the old Mosler plantation, many valley residents took jobs there while continuing to farm their land.

Forced to Sell

But in recent years, rising land values have forced property owners who couldn't pay their taxes to sell acreage that had been in their families for four or five generations.

With the Rock Island Railroad and the Trinity River running through it, Mosier Valley is prime for industrial development. Land now sells for as much as $10,000 an acre.

And as the area becomes increasingly industrial, younger people are moving away in search of more stable surroundings. There has not been a new home built in the community in years.

Many older residents have held on to an acre or two, enough for a small house, a few hogs and a garden. But scattered in between the well-kept homesteads are ramshackle houses rented by newcomers, their yards cluttered with junk.

Vandalism and illegal dumping along Mosier Valley Road has turned the neighborhood into an eyesore. Outsiders who do not want to pay the fee at a public dump routinely stop along the back roads to empty truckloads of dirty mattresses, gutted television sets, old furniture, tires and other junk. Rarely are police around to arrest them.

Blame Fort Worth

Mosier Valley natives, like Vada Mae Johnson, whose great-grandmother was given 40 acres in the area as a wedding present from a local plantation owner, blame Fort Worth for the community's decline.

"We have never gotten anything from the city except for a few streetlights," said Johnson, a public school teacher who taught in the all-black Mosier Valley school for 19 years.

"In the final analysis," she said, "it's always the same: 'There's not enough money for the community, the community's too small.' I've heard it so many times that when they start saying it, I can almost repeat it for them.

"You see them alloting money by the thousands to other communities, but there's nothing for you except sweet talk," she said. "Well, sweet talk and doing nothing doesn't help."

The community was incorporated into Fort Worth in 1963 when the city annexed a seven-square-mile finger of land ending at the Great Southwest Airport site. Mosier Valley property owners have been paying city taxes since, but they still are waiting for the trash to be cleared off the roads, for better police protection, for a playground for their children and all the services they've seen going to other neighborhoods.

"The city of Fort Worth could care less about that place," Constable Brown said. "I've gone with those people several times to the City Council and they made promises to do something, but nothing's ever been done for that community."

Mosier Valley is one of 11 areas in the city identified as poverty-stricken, but none of the city's $7.6-million federal community rehabilitation grant went to the area last year or to any of the three previous years of the program's existence.

intentional. They admit the area has been shortchanged, but they say public resources are scarce, and, after all, no place stays the same forever. The whole area is changing.

But Mosier Valley is not like other changing neighborhoods, not with residents such as Farrow, who at 97 is a living history lesson.

"My name is Ollie, but they all call me Daddy, Daddy Farrow," the thin, wrinkled man said. "I even get my mail to Daddy Farrow sometimes."

Born to the children of slaves about 20 years after emanicipation, he has lived in Mosier Valley most of his life. On his 40-acre farm, Farrow, along with his wife, who died several years ago, raised cattle and hogs, grew vegetables and fruit, operated a dairy and brought up five children.

"Oh man, I like the country so much better than the city," he said. "I had cows for my milk and butter. I had a plum tree, peaches, everything. You got to buy all that in town."

Farrow has turned over to his children the management of his land, except for two acres on which he lives.

His hearing is nearly gone now, but his mind is still sharp. He does not farm anymore, and he quit driving his pickup truck last year. But he still chops his own wood and repairs the fences.

Duane Gage, a college history professor and chairman of the county's historieal commission, is trying to preserve at least a memory of the vanishing community.

At his encouragement, several students are conducting research to be used in applying for state historical markers for the Mosier Valley school, the St. John Missionary Baptist Church and the community cemetery.

"Whether the people survive out there or not, their legacy will remain," Gage said. "That's about all any community can hope for in the long run—just to be remembered."

Folk art exhibit opens at Amon Carter

Dios Padre, "God, the Father," by New Mexican Artist Rafael Aragon will be on display with other pieces of 18th and 19th century religious folk art from the American Southwest at the Amon Carter Museum, October through December.

FORT WORTH — An exhibition of religious folk art from the American Southwest will open at the Amon Carter Museum on Oct. 8. The exhibition, entitled "Santos: The Religious Folk Art of New Mexico," will feature more than 80 paintings and sculptures from the collection of the Taylor Museum at the Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center.

Hours for the exhibit are normal museum hours, Tuesday through Saturday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission is free. Public tours of the museum start at 2 p.m.; group tours must be scheduled with the museum's tour coordinator at least two weeks in advance by calling 738-1933.

Due to the cultural and geographical isolation of the Spanish Colony of New Mexico, medieval religous practices survived in the distant mountain villages through the 19th century. Paintings and sculptures of saints, called Santos, were created in these villages during the 18th and 19th centuries by folk artists to fill the need in churches and homes for devotional images. These works were extremely important in the religious life of the isolated parishioner.

Every community, no matter how small, had a church or chapel which was erected as a community project under the direction of the priests. These structures, simply built, made use of existing materials.

The churches were furnished with the handiwork of the parish. Imported statues or altar furniture were rarely used. More often, the altar was a rough wooden arrangement of panels which were covered with native white plaster, gesso. The altar was often decorated with paintings of Christ, the Virgin, or one of the many saints held in reverence by the community. Each village commonly had its patron saint. These were represented by retablos, (paintings) or bultos (sculptures).

Bultos were generally made from cottonwood. The figure was painted over with gesso to make a ground for color pigments. Colors were many and varied. The artistas used everything from daubs of leftover housepaint and native mineral colors in oil to commercial oil paints.

The best santos are generally considered to be those which demonstrate little or no Mexican or Spanish influences. Although the people were of Spanish descent, in many cases a local artist would develop a style completely of his own, expressing his and his people's interpretation of their faith with originality and reverence.

It has been asserted that the entire production of religious art in New Mexico is the work of perhaps a dozen men. The first documented artist was Laguna Santero. Santero's style strongly influenced on later New Mexican artists. His flat linear paintings, created through the use of local tempera on pine panels, did not include much of the naturalism of contemporary Baroque paintings.

Taylor Museum Curator Will Wroth explains the difference: "Unlike Baroque art which was naturalistic, more intent on showing human qualities as they look, folk art is more abstract and impressional. Folk art expresses spiritual ideas rather than realist o natural ones."

Wroth will be at the Amon Carter Museum, Nov. 7, to present a lecture on the Santos exhibit. The exhibit is particularly interesting, Wroth says, because it displays the religious aspect of New Mexican culture before the American occupation in 1846.

"They have gained acclaim as fine, distinctive examples of folk art," he says. "They are unique to the United States, and they are simple, direct and capture your attention."

Highlights of the exhibit are San Juan Nepomuceno by Santero, Nuestra Senora by Arroyo Hondo Carver, and Carreta de la Muerte by an unknown carver. Other pieces include Dios Padre by Rafael Aragon and San Miguel.

Hispanics celebrate Independence Day

By PAT JIMENEZ
Star-Telegram Writer

By the time the entertainment — from traditional Mexican dances to foot-stomping Western entertainment — had ended Thursday, more than 1,500 people had crowded into Marine Park on Fort Worth's North Side to celebrate Mexican Independence Day.

Adults wandered among the booths, juggling burritos, tamales and drinks, while children begged parents for money for the rides.

One North Side resident, Tonie Perales, looked surprised when she was asked why she was there.

"We celebrate the Fourth of July. We can celebrate our independence day, too," she said.

"Texas was a part of Mexico" when it gained independence, said Edward Smith. "It's only right that we should celebrate today."

Miguel Hidalgo y Castillo, a priest in the town of Dolores, is traditionally given credit for the cry "El grito" that began the Mexican revolution in 1810. According to the story, he called his people together, denounced the tyranny of Spain, and at the same time called upon the Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of the Indians, for protection.

The fiesta continues until midnight Sunday. It lasts from 6 p.m. until midnight today and from noon to midnight Saturday. It will resume at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

On Saturday, a 3.1-mile Funrun will start at 8 a.m. at Marine Park. The entry fee is $6. Late registration will be $8. Proceeds will go to the Mexican American College Education Fund.

Proceeds from the rest of the fiesta will go to the city for use in Marine Park, to All Saints Catholic Church, and to other organizations to be used for senior citizens or education.

The fiesta in Marine Park is only a part of the festivities of the week that had been named "National Hispanic Heritage Week."

"This fiesta, in fact, this whole week, is a chance for Mexicans to celebrate their heritage, to show they are proud of themselves. It's also a chance for everyone else to learn a little bit about us, enjoy the music, the dancing," said Alberto Cordova.

Celebrating El 16 de Septiembre

Go for the 'grito'

Today is Mexico's Fourth of July

By ROBERT SELTZER
Star-Telegram Writer

In grade schools across Mexico, young scholars relive an adventure that rivals the acts of heroism during the Revolutionary War in America.

It is El Grito de Dolores, the cry for independence in a small Mexican village. On the morning of Sept. 16, 1810, Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla summoned the parishioners to his church earlier than usual. Instead of discussing the hereafter, he told the Indians and mestizos about their present lives, about their bondage to a country thousands of miles away — Spain.

Although he eventually led an army of 80,000, marching under the banner of the Virgen de Guadalupe, Hidalgo was captured and executed by the Spanish authorities, his head severed and fastened to a pole as a warning to the Mexicans. This grisly act of symbolism failed to stop the fight for independence, though. The struggle continued until 1824, when Mexico ended three centuries of Spanish domination and became a republic.

Today, Mexicans — and Mexican-Americans — celebrate the day Hidalgo rang the church bells to make his proclamation to the villagers. El 16 de Septiembre is equivalent to the Fourth of July in the United States. Participants usually launch the festivities by reenacting the famous cry for freedom.

In Fort Worth, people will mark the grito from Thursday through Sunday at Marine Park on the North Side. The celebration, sponsored by the youth organization of All Saints Catholic Church, will include mariachis, dancers and, of course, food — everything from tacos to enchiladas to tamales at more than 60 booths. Church members expect this to be the biggest bash since it started in 1977.

"The people who fought for independence were paving the way for where we are now," said Belen Papajohn, who is coordinating the fiesta. "Mexico was such a part of Texas, and I think Texans today have to recognize it. It's a beautiful thing to be recognized as a Mexican American. I think the dark skin, the thick hair, the big brown eyes are beautiful. Anyone who speaks both languages should be proud."

To symbolize this dual culture, a group of Boy Scouts will kick off the celebration by raising both the Mexican and American flags at the park. Then comes an invocation. Then, of course, the grito.

Celebration participants will be treated to dance demonstrations.

"We want the whole city to participate in this," Papajohn said. "Not just the Mexican-Americans. When we started, we sent letters to all kinds of organizations, asking for help and donations."

The fiesta also will feature a ballet folklorico, a beauty pageant and an art show with paintings that depict the Hispanic history of Texas on black velvet. Beauty contestants must be well versed in the tradition of el grito, and the winner will receive a $2,000 scholarship. They will wear Mexican folk dresses.

The event is scheduled from 7 to 9 p.m. Thursday, 6 p.m. to midnight Friday, noon to midnight Saturday, and 2:30 to 10:30 p.m. Sunday. Admission is $1, with children under 12 and adults past 65 years old admitted free. Proceeds will go toward improvements at Marine Park.

"We expect between 15 and 30,000 people to come each day," Papajohn said. "We hope. But we're not really making any predictions about the money it will bring in. We hope for $30,000 or $35,000. A lot of that will go to pay expenses, like the lights."

Mariachi leader found success in Fort Worth

By Pat Gordon
Fort Worth Bureau of The News

FORT WORTH — Mexico's Independence Day is a time of dancing to mariachi bands, feasting on traditional foods and laughing with friends.

But Clemente Villegas remembers Sept. 16 as the day he received his first pair of store-bought shoes.

"My father always made shoes for the family from little pieces of skin and tires," said Villegas, who is now leader of a Fort Worth mariachi band. "But when I was 6 years old, he bought me my first pair from the store. They were brown and very comfortable."

When he was 17, Villegas left his rural hometown of Michuacan, in central Mexico, and headed for Mexico City as a professional mariachi musician. A tour contract eventually brought him to Texas.

"Sixteen de Septiembre is an important fiesta for all of Mexico," Villegas said. "The ladies would get new dresses and the men new sombreros. They would all go to the plaza, and the ladies would walk around it. When a man saw a lady he liked, he would try to talk to her or hand her a flower. The band would gather in the middle of the plaza and play for the people just like they will do here in Fort Worth."

On Sept. 16-19, Fort Worth will hold a traditional Mexican fiesta in Marine Park to celebrate Mexico's independence from Spain in 1810. The fiesta will include food, drinks and games. Mariachi bands, including Villegas' Los Caporales, will stroll through the park.

Villegas plays the violin now, but he first learned to play the guitar.

"My brother had a guitar, which he couldn't play but didn't want anyone else to touch," Villegas said. "When he wasn't home, I would pick it up and strum it, finally teaching myself to play. It caused a lot of trouble. My brother would come home and my sisters would say, 'Clemente's been playing with your guitar.' "

With 12 children in the family and his father earning 5 pesos a day working in the vegetable fields, there was no money for guitars. He used a friend's guitar for years before he bought his own. An American visitor to the rural village, which had a population of 19, bought him his first violin.

"My family was surprised when I learned to play the guitar and violin and it's still a surprise to them," Villegas said. "But now that I've had all the opportunities I've had here, they feel better about it. When I wanted to leave home to become a musician, my father said, 'No, it's too dangerous. Stay here. What's the difference if you're poor?' But I wanted to play the guitar and to help my family."

His father finally gave his consent, and Villegas left the rural area for the first time. In Mexico City, he found a plaza filled with strolling mariachi players. He soon found a group that needed a guitar player and joined it. In 1970, he toured Japan for six months, then South America. A contract to tour the United States brought him north in 1974. He married a Fort Worth woman and stayed.

Now when the 36-year-old man returns to his hometown each year, he's greeted as a music star.

"My family and friends think I'm a big thing," he said with a grin that is quickly erased by a frown. "But I'm not. When I go home, the rich people of the town invite me to their homes. My friends take off their hats to say hello. I don't feel good about this. I say, 'No. I'm still the same as before.' "

Villegas knew no English when he first came to Texas. He learned it from watching television and listening to the radio. He never attended school as a child, so he reads more English than Spanish.

He still sends money to Mexico to help support his parents and relatives, and he advises others to do the same.

"Almost everyone comes here illegally," Villegas said with a laugh. "I understand perfectly why they do. I was very lucky I could come legally. I love this country and respect it, but I think sometime, maybe when I'm old, I'll go back to Mexico and live, if Mexico will change a little for the good."

Festivities to celebrate Diez y seis

A four-day fiesta in celebration of Mexico's Independence Day — 16th of September — is scheduled to begin Thursday at Marine Park on Fort Worth's North Side.

Marine Park is located in an area surrounded by N.W. 20th, Clinton and N.W. 16th streets. Admission to the fiesta will be $1, with children under 12 and senior citizens admitted free.

Fair-goers will be able to enjoy various food booths and carnival rides, as well as a mercado, or market. Strolling mariachis will serenade the crowd. A main stage will provide additional entertainment, including the Ballet Folklorico de Navarro from San Antonio and the Ballet Folklorico Azteca of Fort Worth.

WARMING UP . . . Jackie Valenciano, left, and Carol Morales rehearsed Sunday for fiesta beginning Thursday at Echo Park

A new event at this year's fiesta will be an art competition for paintings on black velvet. Sponsored by Bob L. Sawyer of Sawyer Entertainment Enterprises Inc., the first-place prize will be $500. The paintings will be exhibited during the fiesta, and some may be offered for sale.

In addition, a series of seminars sponsored by the Department of Housing and Urban Development will be presented during the week in the T&P Building, 221 W. Lancaster, in honor of National Hispanic Heritage Week.

The seminar topics include: Ramon Guajardo of Fort Worth on the Meaning of the 16th of September; Dr. Douglas W. Richmond on an historical perspective of the Mexican Revolution; Rosalind Soliz on Hispanic women in the news media; Jim Richmond, from the governor's office, on the impact of Hispanics on state issues; and Irma Facundo on Hispanics' image.

According to tradition, Mexico's fight for independence from Spain began in 1810 when Miguel Hidalgo y Castillo, a priest from the town of Dolores, rang the church bells calling the townspeople to the church. There, he let go a cry — the Cry of Dolores or El Grito de Dolores — calling for the people to rise up against the tyranny of Spain.

He called upon the Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of the Indians, for protection, shouting: "Down with bad gvernment. Long live the Virgin of Guadalupe."

"This fiesta is a fiesta for all Texans, not just Mexican-Americans, because in 1810, Texas was a part of Mexico," said Belen Papajohn, fiesta chairman.

In past years the fiesta was sponsored by All Saints Catholic Church, but this year it will be sponsored by the 16th of September Fiesta Committee, an 11-person committee headed by Mrs. Papajohn.

"We wanted to make sure that there will be continuity if something happened to any of us," Mrs. Papajohn said.

Fort Worth's Mexican-American population will be celebrating a special day Thursday — El Grito, the shout for Mexico's independence from Spain.

Delicate situation

A dancer with the Ballet Folklorico de Navarro from San Antonio balances a glass of water on her head during the group's performance on the third day of Mexican Independence Day Festivities at Marine Park Saturday afternoon. Sunday will close out the festival with events scheduled from 2:30 p.m. to midnight.

Mexican-American Celebrations

Cinco de Mayo celebration now goes beyond Hispanics

Texas officially separated from Mexico more than a century and a half ago, but each May 5 Texans and Mexicans reaffirm their mutual heritage as they celebrate Cinco de Mayo, commemorating the Battle of Puebla, in which the Mexican army won a significant victory over the French.

By military standards the Battle of Puebla on May 5, 1862, was insignificant, for the war between Mexico and France lasted five more years. But in terms of patriotic importance, the date rates second only to Sept. 16, the Mexican Independence Day.

Schools and government offices in Mexico close each May 5, and throughout the Southwestern United States Mexican-American organizations celebrate with parades, fiestas and dances.

"That battle proved that the Mexican Army could defeat a national power. For us it is a very important patriotic day," said Humberto Martinez Romero, the Mexican consul general in Dallas. "We celebrate to recognize that any Mexican citizen or any citizen with Mexican descent should remember this heroic occasion."

On that hazy May morning, 5,000 French troops marched into the Valley of Puebla on the Yucatan Pennisula under instructions from Napoleon III to take Mexico for the French Empire. The French were well trained and confident of an easy victory over the ragtag Mexican army.

By late afternoon, however, Mexican troops led by Mexican Gen. Ignacio Zaragoza and aided by bands of Indians had routed the French, sending them scurrying back to the coast. The war continued until June 17, 1867, but Mexicans proudly point to May 5 as the day they devastated the French.

"Yes, it is a Mexican holiday, but it is important to celebrate it here as well: As Mexican-Americans, we like to be proud that freedom is important to us too," said Alice Contreras, director of bilingual programs for the Fort Worth schools. "We're really not that different. We have heroes and they have had the same kind of ambition for their country."

During the last decade, Cinco de Mayo has become less of a purely Mexican holiday in the United States, as non-Spanish-speaking residents have joined the celebration. Sal Valdez, program director of radio station KESS, which is sponsoring a Cinco de Mayo celebration in Dallas, said he is expecting several thousand Anglos and blacks to join the celebration.

"Ten years ago, I don't think anyone outside the Mexican community would have known about the day, but now we're seeing an increasing awareness of the importance of emphasizing cultural activities for everyone," Ms. Contreras said. "Cinco de Mayo isn't just for Hispanics, non-English-speaking people. It is something to share within a multi-cultural society."

Cinco de Mayo activities locally will include:

Radio station KESS, Coca-Cola and Budweiser are co-sponsoring the largest Cinco de Mayo celebration in the Metroplex Saturday and Sunday at the Centennial building on the State Fair Grounds in Dallas. More than 125,000 people are expected to come to hear musicians from Texas and Mexico and browse through the commercial booths. Admission, parking and all activities at the celebration are free. Cars, color televisions and other prizes also will be given away. Hours are from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. Saturday and from noon to 7 p.m. Sunday.

All Saints Catholic Church will have a communitywide celebration in Fort Worth also on Saturday and Sunday, starting at noon both days. Mariachi bands, clowns, ballet folklorico, custom car exhibits, carnival rides and Mexican food will be part of the entertainment. Admission is free. Proceeds from food sales and the carnival rides will go to All Saints for a scholarship fund. The celebration will be on the church grounds at 214 N.W. 20th Street.

The Fort Worth Chapter of the American G.I. Forum, in conjunction with Circle T Girl Scout Council and LA HISPANA Business & Professional Women's Club, will host a fiesta from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Wednesday in Burnett Park. The Ballet Folklorico Azteca of Fort Worth, supported by a grant from the Arts Council of Fort Worth and Tarrant County, will dance from 11:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

Also in Fort Worth, residents of the Ripley Arnold Housing Project at 310 N. Cherry will celebrate Cinco de Mayo from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. Monday. Included in the festivities will be speakers and the coronation of a queen.

In Dallas, the Federation of Mexican Organizations will host a celebration from 5 p.m. to 10 p.m. Wednesday in Pikes Park.

The Fort Worth Independent School District, too, is celebrating Cinco de Mayo at various schools beginning Friday and continuing through next week. The celebrations include:

Meacham Middle School, 5 p.m. Friday; a festival on the grounds with mariachis, ballet folklorico, craft market, music and authentic food.

Chief's letter poignant prophecy

"The Great Chief in Washington sends word that he wishes to buy our land. How can you buy or sell the sky — the warmth of the land? The idea is strange to us. Yet we do not own the freshness of the air or the sparkle of the water. How can you buy them from us? Every part of this earth is sacred to my people. Every shiny pine needle, every sandy shore, every mist in the dark woods, every clearing and humming insect is holy in the memory and experience of my people.

"We know that white man does not understand our ways. One portion of the land is the same to him as the next, for he is a stranger who comes in the night and takes from the land whatever he needs. The earth is not his brother but his enemy and when he has conquered it, he moves on. He leaves his father's graves and his children's birthright is forgotten.

"There is no quiet place in the white man's cities. No place to hear the leaves of spring or the rustle of insect wings.

"But perhaps because I am savage and do not understand — the clatter only seems to insult the ears. And what is there to life if a man cannot hear the lovely cry of the whip-porwill or the arguments of the frog around the pond at night?

"The whites too, shall pass — perhaps sooner than other tribes. Continue to contaminate your bed and you will one night suffocate in your own waste. When the buffalo are slaughtered, the wild horses all tamed, the secret corners of the forest heavy with the scent of many men and the view of the ripe hills blotted by talking wires. Where is the thicket? Gone. Where is the eagle? Gone. And what is it to say goodbye to the swift and the hunt, the end of living and beginning of survival."

CHIEF SEALTH OF THE DUWANISH TRIBE in Washington wrote these words in a letter sent to President Franklin Pierce in 1855.

Texas Indians vie for dance championship

By CHRISTOPHER EVANS
Star-Telegram Writer

GRAND PRAIRIE — While a new Miss America was probably still in the sack Sunday morning, Nina Red Cherries, a relatively new Miss Indian Texas, was attending services at the Briarwood United Methodist Church in Plano.

The Saturday night footlights had been hot in Atlantic City, but so had the 95-ish temperatures that beat down on the dusty dance arena at the 20th annual National Championship Pow-wow here all Saturday afternoon. And Miss Red Cherries, a genteel Texas Women's University sophomore with wide, dark eyes, had sat and danced and sat and danced through the whole thing, occasionally stealing a sip of Sprite from a can when as she sat back on her folding-chair throne.

Star-Telegram/RODGER MALLISON
A photographer zooms in on one dancer.

Only rarely did Miss Red Cherries, clad in full Indian attire and shawl, get a chance to find a spot of shade at Trader's Village flea market, site of the pow-wow. And when the Saturday part of the dancing competition was through, nary a bead of sweat was visible on her brow. The red, white and blue crown with a lone star in front was still in place, as was the single feather in back.

"I'm wearing a wool dress tonight," she said, smiling, "then a traditional Navajo costume tomorrow . . . I'm having a great time."

Miss Red Cherries is an urban American Indian whose roots are Arapaho, Navajo, Cheyenne and Potawatomi. When she was crowned Miss Indian Texas 1982-83 on the Alabama-Coushatta reservation near Livingston in April, she pledged to spend the year representing the Indians of Texas as her sister Rhonda did the year before.

Although there were but six contestants in the ceremonial pageant, the event was not altogether different from other, more familiar "Miss" pageants. Costumes were important as, to some degree, was appearance.

"The main things are that you have to have a good knowledge of Indian traditions, especially your own, and poise," Miss Red Cherries said. "The winner has to be able to speak in public, to communicate. I will make a lot of appearances. It will be fun, but it is very serious what I have to do.

"I would like to see the Indians get more involved in preserving and promoting our heritage," she said. "Getting our own people involved is very important. I would like to see a lot more girls in the Miss Indian Texas competition and to get contributions that will help what we're doing.

"But what I hope to do most is start some interaction between people who are not Indians and Indians," Miss Red Cherries said. "We can benefit from each other. We all have problems. We are all Americans. Indians are everyday people. I think it is important that young Indian people get an education. Uneducated people are everybody's problem."

When she isn't decked out in beads and headdress and shawl touting American Indian heritage, Nina Red Cherries is ever the All-American girl. "I play my flute, I work with children and I'm president of the MYF (Methodist Youth Fellowship) at my church," she said. "My major is speech pathology and I'd like to be able to work with children in that area eventually."

There are, Miss Red Cherries said, certain drawbacks to being an urban Indian. Asked if she ever lived on a reservation, she replied "No sir, but I do visit the Potawatomi reservation in Oklahoma with my father.

"Since I'm one-fourth Potawatomi, I feel a sense of good being when I'm there," she said. "Living in a big city is a disadvantage in a way, because you're really an Indian only on the weekends.

"But when you go to the reservation, it makes you aware of how important your background is.

"It's a feeling that's hard to explain if you haven't felt it before . . . It makes me feel very fortunate."

More than 150 students and parents attended a program at Smithfield Jr. High which focused on Kiowa culture. It was planned and coordinated by ICHC member Mike Patterson.

Dear Parents:

As an enrichment activity to our Texas History classes at Smithfield Jr. High, we are pleased to announce a short program to be held on Tuesday, October 26, at 7:30 p.m. in the school gym. All Smithfield Jr. High Texas History students and their parents are invited to attend.

Our guests, George and Marjorie Tahbone, will present a short program on the culture and history of the Kiowas, an important Indian tribe in Texas history. Both Mr. and Mrs. Tahbone are members of prominent Kiowa families; Mrs. Tahbone is a descendant of Kiowa chiefs Big Bow and Satanta, while Mr. Tahbone's ancestors include Gotebo and Two-Hatchet, all active warriors of the late 1800's.

Mr. Tahbone's grandmother, whose Indian name was To-goam-gat-ty, was born an Anglo girl named Mary Hamilton. Her family's log home in Azle, Texas was attacked by Kiowa warriors in April, 1867, and she was taken into captivity. She grew up with the Indians, married, and lived a long and happy life as a Kiowa.

Dear Parents:

As an enrichment activity to our Texas History classes at Smithfield Jr. High, we are pleased to announce a short program to be held on Tuesday, October 26, at 7:30 p.m. in the school gym. All Smithfield Jr. High Texas History students and their parents are invited to attend.

Our guests, George and Marjorie Tahbone, will present a short program on the culture and history of the Kiowas, an important Indian tribe in Texas history. Both Mr. and Mrs. Tahbone are members of prominent Kiowa families; Mrs. Tahbone is a descendant of Kiowa chiefs Big Bow and Satanta, while Mr. Tahbone's ancestors include Gotebo and Two-Hatchet, all active warriors of the late 1800's.

Mr. Tahbone's grandmother, whose Indian name was To-goam-gat-ty, was born an Anglo girl named Mary Hamilton. Her family's log home in Azle, Texas was attacked by Kiowa warriors in April, 1867, and she was taken into captivity. 4th of July, Keller-style

Saturday was a day to show your colors in Keller. Of course, red, white and blue were the official colors of the Fourth of July celebration in the park. But Char Burns, above, displayed a rainbow in her watercolor exhibit and demonstration. And Randy Adams, 8, below, emerged circus-bright from a face-painting session. What would a patriotic celebration be without rousing musical accompaniment? This time, it ws provided by puppets, manipulated at left by Kathy Willtrout, left, and David McMurry.

GRAPEVINE — Attendance estimates range from 6,000 to 12,000, depending on the source, but all agree that everyone who attended the Fourth of July Festival here Sunday had a good time.

Vernie Henderson, general chairman for the festival, said he "couldn't be more pleased." Henderson said the Chamber of Commerce, which sponsored the celebration, has already received a letter of commendation for holding the festival.

Work has already begun for the 1983 Independence Day festival, according to Henderson. "It looks like we've already signed up the rides," he explained, adding that the chamber expects to have more rides for the 1983 festival.

Continuous traffic ambled between rows of concession and craft booths from 1 p.m. until dark. Homemade ice cream, watermelon, stained glass, woodcrafts and bumper stickers were among the items available.

Johnnie High's Country Music Revue provided entertainment throughout the afternoon. A crowd favorite was young Joey Floyd.

At 8 p.m., High and company moved into Mustang Stadium to kick-off a patriotic show and

July 4 festival planned as patriotic tradition

Grapevine's First Annual Fourth of July Festival will be the city's first patriotic festival that promises to become an annual tradition. The festival will begin at 1 p.m., July 4 at Mustang Stadium and fireworks will be displayed at dusk.

Vernie Henderson, a festival organizer, said citizen response has been good and there is plenty of people who want to help to ensure that a well-planned and fun festival will come about. "Considering that we didn't have a full year to plan this, we are doing well," Henderson said, "and we'll have a whole year to organize the next year's festival."

Johnnie High has lined up an entertaining program of talent that will appear under the trees during the festivities.

Included in the lineup will be High himself along with some of the entertainers who regularly appear on his Country Music Revue in Fort Worth.

Joey and Jill Floyd (two talented youngsters), Gloria and Homer, a ventriloquist act, singing cowboy Steve Mitchell from Colleyville, and the Grapevine Fillies will be entertaining throughout the festival.

Following the fireworks display at dusk, High will perform in the stadium. In addition to High, Grapevine's newly-formed Community Chorus will present a repertoire of patriotic music.

A selection or rides will be available, a small carnival will be set up in the grassy area of the stadium between the G-CISD Administration Building and Mustang Stadium.

Carnival coordinator Riney Jordan said seven rides including Mixup, Moon Walk, a ferris wheel, Scram, and Airplane will begin to operate Saturday night. In addition to the rides, a few concessions should be ready as well as games such as a baseball toss.

Approximately 50 booths will be set up during the festival that will sell homemade ice cream, balloons, cakes, stained glass, wind chimes, flowers, and numerous arts and crafts.

Vernie Henderson said 33 booths have been registered and space is still available for 17 more. Spaces are 12' by 12' and each person or organization must provide their own booths.

For reservations, call Al Meyers at 481-3912; Vernie Henderson at 488-7561; or Grapevine Chamber of Commerce at 481-1522.

Americans celebrate July Fourth

Shuttle makes biggest bang

Associated Press

From space shuttle Columbia's big bang over California to the Capitol in Washington, D.C., where a Soviet emigre's baton led the National Symphony, Americans celebrated their 206th birthday with picnics, festivals and fireworks from coast to coast.

Cannon greeted the dawn at the Battery in New York City, roaring a 50-gun salute Sunday to the Statue of Liberty. But the biggest Fourth of July firecracker rang out over the California desert when the shuttle crashed through the sound barrier, sending two sonic booms rolling across the Antelope Valley.

"Unbelievable ... just magnificent," said President Reagan, among the 500,000 people to watch the landing. "You've just given the American people a Fourth of July present to remember," he told astronauts Ken Mattingly and Henry Hartsfield.

With gasoline plentiful and cheaper than a year ago, many Americans took to the road. By early today, more than 250 motorists had died on the nation's highways.

An older mode of transit was on display in Boston Harbor as the USS Constitution made its yearly cruise. Old Ironsides, the 185-year-old frigate that thwarted British cannonballs in the War of 1812, was then berthed in the opposite direction to weather evenly.

IN JACKSON, Miss., dozens of ballet dancers from around the world mingled with their U.S. counterparts as a display of sparklers and Roman candles capped the two-week International Ballet Competition.

'On the West Lawn of the Capitol, Soviet emigre Mstislav Rostropovich conducted the National Symphony Orchestra before 145,000 people.

Police in Washington estimated 400,000 people gathered to watch fireworks near the Lincoln Memorial. In New York City, a rowdy crowd estimated at 250,000 watched colorful bombs burst over New York Harbor.

In Massachusetts, the fireworks combined with rousing music by the Boston Pops to bring out 175,000 celebrants along the Charles River.

But St. Louis claimed the biggest gathering. Police estimated 2 million revelers jammed the Mississippi waterfront on the first two days of the Veiled Prophet Fair.

St. Louis claimed the biggest gathering — 2 million revelers jammed the Mississippi waterfront.

The Beach Boys sang near the Gateway Arch and fair organizers proclaimed it the best-attended Independence Day bash in the nation's history. "I haven't seen this many people in one spot since the government gave away cheese," cracked comedian Bob Hope.

ELSEWHERE ON the muddy Mississippi — in Hannibal, Mo. — a boy from Rochester, Miss., outwhite-washed 14 others at the 26th annual Tom Sawyer Days. Doug Zmolok, 11, won the contest judged on quickness, workmanship and costumes recreating the Mark Twain character.

Meanwhile, a gathering of another sort was taking place in Council, Idaho, where about 6,000 people got together in a mountain meadow with drugs, song and a prayer for peace.

The gathering came under the banner of the Rainbow Family, a group with roots in the hippie movement of the 1960s. Marijuana was plentiful, and one 10-year-old traded a thimble of hashish along with other trinkets outside a soup kitchen dubbed the Hobo Hilton.

In Portland, Maine, residents celebrated their city's 350th birthday along with Independence Day. Vice President George Bush rededicated a 191-year-old lighthouse in Portland harbor.

Fires caused by fireworks were common during the holiday. New York City reported two house fires that injured nine people. Officials also blamed fireworks for a blaze at the soon-to-be demolished Pan Pacific auditorium in Los Angeles.

The Fourth of July was a dry one for most beachgoers at popular Stinson Beach near San Francisco. Because of recent sightings of great white sharks, most people went no deeper than their ankles.

THE ROCKETS' RED GLARE ... Sunday night's spectacular fireworks show at Heritage Park lighted up the city's skyline.

'Bang-up' show crowd tops 100,000

A Fourth of July fireworks show lighted up the sky over Fort Worth Sunday night as residents watched, oohed, ahed and applauded from vantage points throughout the city.

Deputy Fire Chief S.L. Williams estimated that more than 100,000 people jammed Heritage Park and the areas immediately surrounding the Trinity River to watch the colorful pyrotechnics and listen to the resounding explosions.

Although Williams said the crowd was the largest he had ever seen in his 26 years as a firefighter in Fort Worth, there was no official estimate of the number of people who saw the show.

"I could see people everywhere. I couldn't see far enough with my binoculars not to see people," Williams said.

He said the Tandy Center parking lot was jammed with people, as were the roofs of most downtown parking centers and the Tandy Center itself.

The North Main Street viaduct was "solid" with people while traffic was bumper-to-bumper along the Jacksboro Highway and near the Texas Electric Service Co. generating plant along North Main.

"There were people just everywhere you looked. There were more people scattered over a bigger area than I've ever seen before," Williams said.

Firefighters reported a handful of minor grass fires around the display site. They said there were no medical emergencies at the display.

Though the display ended about 10 p.m., Williams said it was after midnight before the traffic cleared in the near North Side area.

"It looked like most of the people had a ball," Williams said.

FOURTH'S A-POPPIN'

Here's a holiday roundup of North Texas celebrations

By RITA L. B. PARSON
Star-Telegram Writer

Skies across Tarrant County and other nearby areas once again will be colored with explosive fireworks this weekend in celebration of America's 206th Independence Day.

Whether it's parades or picnics or games and exhibits you want, there's something somewhere that's tailored especially to help you celebrate just the way you want.

Given the unpredictability of Texas weather, some indoor events, such as the physical fitness exhibit in the Women's Building at Fair Park in Dallas may be worth including on the olde celebration itinerary.

What's happening around the Tarrant County area is highlighted below.

FORT WORTH

An emphasis on height for the 1982 annual July 4 fireworks should make the colorful Independence Day celebrations viewable from most parts of Fort Worth.

Sponsored for the fifth year by the Star-Telegram and Continental National Bank, the exhibit is scheduled to start at 9:15 p.m. Sunday at Heritage Park on the banks of the Trinity River, just northwest of downtown.

Should it rain Sunday, the display will be postponed until 9:15 p.m. Monday.

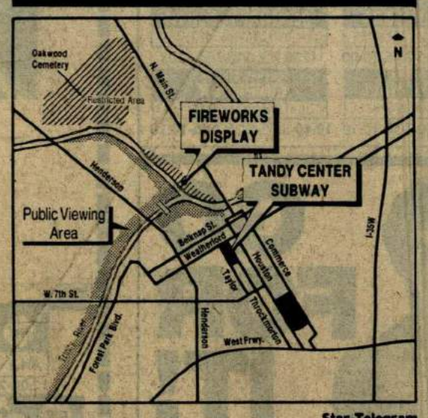
Atlas Enterprises Inc. will be handling the display for the fourth year. The show will use 700 units and 300 pyrotechnic effects, said Royce Trout, Atlas president.

The electronically programmed grand finale has been expanded to last nearly five minutes, show sponsors said.

Included in the show are 12-inch shells, the largest used in the United States, which travel 1,500 feet in the air.

Spectators are encouraged to arrive early along the Trinity River and Heritage Park and bring picnic lunches. No food or drinks will be sold during the show.

Portable restrooms will be available.



Star-Telegram

In addition to the downtown celebration, several Fort Worth communities have their own bashes planned. These include:

COMO

U.S. Rep. Jim Wright, City Councilman Dick Newkirk and other city officials are expected to participate in festivities that began with a parade at 9 a.m. Monday.

Leading the Como Day Parade will be the Como Riding Club with about 20 mounted riders. A procession of about 150 cars, representing businesses, civic groups and churches, are expected to follow the riders.

This is the 31st year of the parade, sponsored by the Como Monitor and the Lake Como Civic League.

The parade route, covering nearly five miles, begins at the intersection of Shilo and Horne streets. It travels north on Horne, then detours to various side streets ending at Como Park.

Festivities, including live entertainment, free barbecue and refreshment booth, will start at the park at 10 a.m.

RYAN PLACE

A five-kilometer footrace, dubbed the Ryan Run, starting at 8 a.m. Sunday at Daggett Park, 1000 Elizabeth Blvd., gets the 20th Ryan Place celebration going. Pre-registered runners are asked to check in as early as 7 a.m.

Other festivities include neighborhood gatherings throughout the morning and afternoon, culminating with a 4:30 p.m. parade, starting at the corner of Elizabeth and College.

Music will be provided by Ryan Place's Botton-of-the-Barrel Band. Membership is open to anyone who can play an instrument or keep rhythm, says band conductor Ross King.

WEDGWOOD-CANDLERIDGE

"Mr. Duwe's Annual Forth of July parade starts at 1 p.m. Sunday at 4409 Cartagena in Wedgwood.

The parade is named after insurance executive Curt Duwe, who was convinced by neighborhood children to help with a celebration.

Parade route will follow Cartagena, Del Prado, Kingswood and Foxfire, stopping at the Racquet Club of Fort Worth on Hulen.

Participants in the parade are invited to a two-hour swim at the Racquet Club, where refreshments will be served. Trophies will be awarded for the most inventive parade entries, Duwe said.

ARLINGTON

This year's theme for the 19th annual Fourth of July parade is "A Salute to the Signers of '76." More than 100 entries in nine categories are expected for the parade.

The parade, starting at 10 a.m. Saturday, will be dedicated in memory of Carolyn Snider, longtime city council woman who died last month.

Beginning at the University of Texas at Arlington parking lot on Cooper, the parade will move north, turning east on Abram Street and proceeding south on Center to the UTA parking lot.

Awards will be presented to winners beginning at 1 p.m. in front of city hall.

A free fireworks display is scheduled to begin at dusk at Arlington Stadium.

AZLE

The Ninth Annual Azle Jamboree, sponsored by the Azle Sertoma, got started Thursday and continues through Saturday.

Conducted on the style of a county fair with jazz dancing, modern dancing and Superstar's competition, Saturday's events begin at 7 a.m. with a sunrise service and pancake breakfast, sponsored by the Ministerial Alliance.

The Firecracker Five Thousand starts at 8 a.m.

Other events include: a flea market to be open all day; 6 p.m. parade; 7 p.m. candidates forum, following the parade; 7:50 p.m. art auction; 8:30 p.m. Miss Jamboree Beauty Contest, entertainment intermittently; 10:30 p.m. fireworks display, following beauty contest.

BELTON

The Fourth of July celebration in Belton in Bell County in Central Texas will garnish some added publicity with the live broadcast of the annual parade at 10 a.m. Saturday on television station KCEN-TV 6.

Activities in Yettie Polk Park will begin at 9 a.m. Saturday with an arts and crafts festival. Several bands and dancers are expected to appear.

New this year will be stagecoach rides and performances by a strolling magician. A puppet show by Dave Ratan and the youth of the First Baptist Church also is scheduled.

A variety of food booths will be opened throughout the day.

The Family Fun Carnival will end Saturday, after five days of operation in Confederate Park, next to the rodeo arena. It features game and food booths and rides from Schafer's 20th Century Shows.

The last performance of the rodeo is set for 8:15 p.m. Saturday.

Festivities end Sunday with Belton's God and Country Concert. The 11th annual concert will be held at First Baptist Church with performances at 3 p.m. and 8 p.m.

BURLESON

A parade starting at Burleson High School and traveling down Johnson Avenue gets July Fourth activities hopping in this town south of Fort Worth.

Theme for the parade is "Freedoms Americans Enjoy."

A $1,500 fireworks exhibit, also sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce, will start at 9 p.m. at Bartlett Park.

CLEBURNE

A parade is planned for 10 a.m. Saturday in downtown Cleburne in Johnson County, and a fireworks show at 9:30 p.m. at the Lake Pat Cleburne Dam.

CROWLEY

Themed "Living Heritage," festivities start at 10 a.m. Saturday with a parade.

Headquarters for activities, sponsored by the Crowley Community Education agency and the Chamber of Commerce, will be the field and parking areas just south of the Bank of Crowley.

The parade will be followed by a day-long carnival with games, food concessionaires, an art show and entertainment. There will be a barbecue dinner at 5 p.m. and a street dance at 8 p.m.

Coast Guard proposes sea lanes at Galveston

GALVESTON (AP) — Ocean-going vessels approaching Galveston, Texas City and Houston ship channels may face stiffer ship traffic rules, said Coast Guard Capt. Robert F. Ingraham, commander of the Port of Galveston.

A Coast Guard Board of Inquiry has recommended that traffic lanes be established for vessels entering and leaving Bolivar Roads, the access from the Gulf to the three busy shipping ports.

The recommendation followed 14 ship collisions and the ramming of an oil rig during a 15-month period prior to March 1980.

The proposal is subject to approval by the International Maritime Organization.

The plan to separate traffic, used in many busy ports around the world, would begin at the junction of four major sea lanes off the Galveston Island coast, Ingraham said.

Keller plans big Fourth celebration

The nation's 206th Fourth of July will be celebrated in Keller from 1 PM to midnight Saturday in Bear Creek Park.

The nation's 206th 4th of July will be celebrated in Keller from 1 p.m.-midnight Saturday in Bear Creek Park.

Games, food, booths, music, puppet shows, a children's movie and a street dance will precede a community fireworks display.

Honorees of the day will be the Keller Fire Department.

Keller is known for its big doin's for "the Fourth" although it's been two years since the last extravaganza. The holiday was celebrated rather quietly last year when the city's centennial saw the hoopla three months earlier.

A committee of representatives from city offices, the Chamber of Commerce, school district, clubs and organizations have worked several months to put the celebration together. The following schedule has been announced:

Noon-1 p.m. -- Set-up time for booths.

1-8 p.m. -- Booths open (arts and crafts, health foods, games, civic and other kinds).

1-8 p.m. -- Volleyball games. (Register and play on tennis courts.)

1-8 p.m. -- 42 tournament (register and play in picnic area).

3-4 p.m. -- Volleyball blood bath: Keller City Council vs. Keller Police Department.

4-8 p.m. -- Games, including water balloon toss, saunter race and sack race.

4-8 p.m. -- Musical entertainment.

4-7 p.m. -- Puppet shows every 30 minutes.

6 p.m. -- Indianettes perform.

6:45 p.m. -- Special presentations.

7-10 p.m. -- Street dance.

8:30 p.m. -- Children's movie on the tennis courts.

10 p.m. -- Fireworks display.

10:30 p.m.-midnight -- Street dance.

Celebrants are advised to bring lawn chairs, particularly for the fireworks display.

"Committee members are very grateful for all of the cooperation and donations received from the community in getting this event organized," committee chairman Tom Cowan said.

Fund to receive another $1000

They aren't able to have their traditional fireworks stand this year, but members of Alpha Theta Chapter of Epsilon Sigma Alpha sorority are ahead of the game in their community service goal of building the Keller ambulance replacement fund.

Members are expected to formally approve a donation of some $1,100 to the fund from their May 29 benefit held in the Barrett Center.

More than $1,000 was raised through games, contests, food, and a street dance. The benefit was a first-ever event for the club, held in lieu of a fireworks stand which was "dismantled" by city ordinance.

The donation will be made after expenses have been deducted.

No unauthorized fireworks July 4th

First, the good news.

Keller has a big community-wide July 4 celebration planned for Saturday in Bear Creek Park.

Now the bad news.

If you're a firecracker fan, you're not going to be able to buy them in the city limits. It is also against the law to shoot fireworks within Keller.

Keller City Council a year ago joined many neighboring towns who've decided the privately-purchased pyrotechnics are a threat to life and property. A ban on fireworks -- their sale and use -- was decreed by city ordinance.

That doesn't mean that the skies will be dark this year. A legal community fireworks display is slated for 10 p.m. Saturday.

Fireworks light up over downtown Fort Worth during last year's celebration

How to 'shoot' fireworks

By SUZANNE BURNETTE
Star-Telegram Writer

Even photography buffs have trouble remembering the procedure for photographing fireworks since it only happens once a year. When Star-Telegram photographers refreshed their memories this year, they decided to pass the tips on to the photographing public.

Here are their suggestions:

- Set the camera on a tripod, if possible. If a tripod isn't available, use the top of a car or anything that will hold the camera steady for a length of time.
- Anticipate where the fireworks will go off and aim the camera approximately. To get a trace effect, open the shutter before the shell bursts, and continue to leave it open until the shell bursts and burns out.
- If something on the horizon is being photographed with the fireworks, the camera must remain still. If only fireworks are being photographed, and if shells are going off in different places in the sky, the camera can be moved between bursts to get more than one burst in the same picture.
- If time elapses between bursts appearing in approximately the same position, cover the lens with a dark, preferably black, object between bursts, to get bursts in same picture. Do not touch the camera.
- Leave the shutter open for no more than 30 seconds in either situation.
- Set the shutter on B or T, and the aperture at *f*8 for slow film, *f*11 for ASA 125-200 film, and *f*16 for ASA 400 or faster. This exposure will get true color.
- For a brighter picture, open the shutter one more f stop than the above guide suggests. The choice of true color or brightness depends on individual preference.

A time-exposure camera is the only kind that will take accurate pictures of fireworks.

However, if you are using a camera that takes snapshots, the best advice is don't use a flash or strobe or any kind of light when photographing only fireworks. If you want a picture of something within 10 feet of you in the foreground, a flash may be necessary.

Arrive early to get seats for Fourth of July show

Sponsors of Sunday night's annual Fourth of July fireworks display encourage spectators to come early to viewing areas along the Trinity River.

The fireworks, to be set off in Heritage Park, should be visible in most parts of Fort Worth, sponsors said.

Fireworks in the 9:15 p.m. show, sponsored by Continental National Bank and the Star-Telegram, will use 12-inch shells and travel 1,500 feet in the air, show organizers said.

In the event of rain, the fireworks display will be at 9:15 p.m. Monday.

Also scheduled for 9:15 p.m. Sunday is the first lighting of the exterior lights on the new 40-story Continental National Bank Building, located at Main and Seventh streets.

Celebration sizzled

Several folks showed up for the fireworks display 24 hours late, and someone lobbed a firecracker onto the dance floor, but overall Keller's Fourth of July celebration was judged a big success.

In fact, proceeds after bills are paid will go toward a permanent account for future July 4 celebrations. Additional funds will be used to buy a public address system for use by civic groups.

Celebration chairman Tom Cowan said police officers estimated between 2,000 and 3,000 celebrants passed through the Bear Creek Park games and food stands during the day.

Since the festivities were held Saturday instead of Sunday, (the dance would have fallen on a "church night"), some people apparently were confused and thought the fireworks display would be Sunday.

Only problems reported were some illegal fireworks and traffic congestion caused by people trying to drive through the blocked-off roadway.

Also, City Councilmen and their stand-ins griped about the outcome of their volleyball game against the police department: the cops won 15-7 and 15-5.

Grapevine

Fireworks display set for today's festival

If you have not made holiday plans and now wish you had, the day is not finished yet. Today marks Grapevine's first Fourth of July Festival which offers something for all the family.

The festival begins at 1 p.m. at Mustang Stadium and fireworks will be displayed tonight at 9:30 to top off the patriotic festivities.

Fifty booths are set up to offer anything from homemade ice cream to stained glass to arts and crafts.

For the kids, there will be a small carnival and games that may also be of interest to mom and dad.

Entertainment is geared for all age groups. Johnnie High will host a line up of entertainers that include youngsters Joey and Jill Floyd, a ventriloquist act by Gloria and Homer, Steve Mitchell from Colleyville, and Grapevine's own Fillies will perform throughout the day.

Grapevine's Community Chorus will present a program of patriotic songs preceeding the fireworks display in Mustang Stadium.

Vernie Henderson, general chairman of the festival, said he is pleased with the response of citizens who have worked hard to make this first festival successful.

Plans for the festival were initiated shortly after a March Chamber of Commerce retreat, Henderson said, and yet every goal that was set was met.

Although it will be at the discretion of next year's committee chairman, Henderson expects the 1983 festival will expand and offer more games and rides.

Event to feature rides, booths, fireworks

Sunday's First Annual Fourth of July Festival will be the city's first patriotic festival that promises to become an annual tradition. The festival will begin at 1 p.m., July 4 at Mustang Stadium and fireworks will be displayed at dusk.

Vernie Henderson, general chairman, said citizen response has been good and there is plenty of people who want to help to ensure that a well-planned and fun festival will come about. "Considering that we didn't have a full year to plan this, we are doing well," Henderson said, "and we'll have a whole year to organize the next year's festival."

Johnnie High has lined up an entertaining program of talent that will appear under the trees during the festivities.

Included in the lineup will be High himself along with some of the entertainers who regularly appear on his Country Music Revue in Fort Worth.

Joey and Jill Floyd (two talented youngsters), Gloria and Homer, a ventriloquist act, singing cowboy Steve Mitchell from Colleyville, and the Grapevine Fillies will be entertaining throughout the festival.

Following the fireworks display at dusk, High will perform in the stadium. In addition to High, Grapevine's newly-formed Community Chorus will present a repertoire of patriotic music.

A selection of rides will be available, a small carnival will be set up in the grassy area of the stadium between the G-CISD Administration Building and Mustang Stadium.

Carnival coordinator Riney Jordan said seven rides including Mixup, Moon Walk, a ferris wheel, Scram, and Airplane will begin to operate Saturday night. In addition to the rides, a few concessions should be ready as well as games such as a baseball toss.

Approximately 50 booths will be set up during the festival that will sell homemade ice cream, balloons, cakes, stained glass, wind chimes, flowers, and numerous arts and crafts.

Community Chorus to debut

The Grapevine Community Chorus, a new group organized in the spring, will be performing with a medley of patriotic music at Grapevine's July Fourth Festival and Fireworks Display to be held at 1 p.m. Sunday July 4 at Mustang Stadium. The presentation, under the direction of Mrs. Madeleine Hemley, accompanied by piano and organ music, will begin at dusk and will continue, along with other musical entertainment, for about 25 minutes. In case of rain, the program will be moved into the Madeleine Auditorium at Grapevine High School.

Although this will be the first performance of the new chorus group, it will not be the first time of directing for Mrs. Hemley. She began teaching vocal music in the Grapevine Schools in 1943 and has devoted many years in stimulating musical interest in the community, as well as in the schools. On her retirement in 1973, Mrs. Hemley was cited for her "outstanding contribution to the cultural and aesthetic development of the entire community, and the influence she has had on the lives of those she taught and with those she came in contact."

As a member of the Grapevine Music Club, Mrs. Hemley directed the first Community Choir in 1962, in the club's presentation of Handel's "The Messiah." This presentation was continued annually for nine years. In 1971, they presented "Requiem" by Faure, and in 1976, in association with the Community Education Department of the Grapevine Schools, the club produced a Centennial Celebration. This collaboration between club and the school was continued and spring concerts combining the talents of the community and the club have been enjoyed by the people of this area, through the years.

Cyclist spreads the word

9,500 mile journey includes Grapevine

In a fitting demonstration of the American spirit, Arnold L. Behrer will pass through Grapevine on July 4 as a part of his 9,500 mile bicycle tour of the United States.

Behrer is celebrating the fourth year of his kidney transplant by bicycling through 25 states in an effort to dramatize the importance of kidney transplantation in the treatment of kidney disease.

Behrer will ride down Main Street in Grapevine at noon of July 4 on his "Kidney-Powered" Schwinn, and continue on to Lewisville before returning to Grapevine. Behrer's arrival and purpose will be officially proclaimed at the Grapevine Fourth of July Festival in a presentation to be made by Johnny High.

Behrer, 26, who is expected to complete his 9500-mile tour in about six months, departed from the Northwest Kidney Center in Seattle, Wa. on April 16 and will complete his journey in his hometown of Pittsburgh, Pa. on October, 25.

Behrer, whose father is a doctor, says he never had second thoughts about a transplant because of his attitude toward life — go for it all.

"Being exposed to sickness all my life," Behrer says, "I felt very fortunate to have a transplant. The kidney transplant was my chance to live a normal life and I decided not to waste it by lying back and taking it easy. "That's part of (the reason) I set out on my bike. To really live and do what I wanted to do, but also to show other people how fortunate they are and what they can do if they want to."

Before his transplant, Behrer says he had never ridden his bike farther than 50 miles, but had a lot of outdoor experience in the Boy Scouts. His first long-distance trip by bike took him 900 miles in three weeks from St. Louis. Mo. to Scott's Bluff, Nebr. in the fall of 1979.

He has since taken the word around the nation in cycling tours of 3,900 and 4,500 miles before beginning his latest journey.

A colorful fireworks display will provide a sparkling, crackling finish to the Fourth of July celebration at Mustang Stadium.

Fireworks to cap 4th of July events

A Fourth of July celebration would be incomplete without the crackle and sparkle of fireworks. Aware of this fact, the Grapevine Chamber of Commerce has scheduled a fireworks display to close Grapevine's Old-Fashioned Fourth of July Festival at Mustang Stadium.

The fireworks display is scheduled to begin at 9:30 p.m. on the 4th and will include several minutes of pyrotechnic splendor. The arrangements vary from 3-inch shells which include various aerial salutes, serpent and star and thunder and rainbow displays to the 6-inch shells which include comets, spider webs, hummingbirds, palm tree and other displays.

The grand finale will consist of 80 rapid shots which will form a multicolored fancy bouquet and signal the official end of the festival.

4th of July Message

Patriotism no spectator sport

Fireworks will crackle on the Fourth of July, banners will wave, bands will blare and paraders will strut.

It's all in the American tradition, the citizens' way of expressing thanks that this democracy has survived, waxed robust and provided strong leadership during trying periods.

President Reagan put into words an aspect of American idealism when he said, "... we as Americans have the capacity now, as we have had in the past, to do whatever needs to be done to preserve this last and greatest bastion of freedom."

Independence Day is a joyous, lighthearted occasion, an appropriate climax to the 21-day Honor America program sponsored by the American Historical and Cultural Society. This special cycle from Flag Day, June 14, to July 4th, establishes a period in which to honor America. A joint resolution of Congress bestowed the official approval and the measure was signed into law by President Ford in 1975.

"The real significance that lies behind our symbolic Fourth of July celebration is the fact that we are a free nation," said Leonard H. Marks, president of Honor America.

But this unique holiday observance goes much further than merely applauding marchers, cheering at ball games, and eating hot dogs and apple pie. There is opportunity here for careful appraisal of American ideals and accomplishments — how we got where we are today and how we will approach the challenge of the 1980s.

On the economic front two generations have been born which never experienced a serious depression. There have been pockets of distress, but these have been largely eliminated by 35 years of continued prosperity. The slumps which have occurred have generally been mild and have quickly run their course.

In the years following World War II, the United States came forth with the Marshall Plan to help restore the shattered economies of war-torn nations. Such a program had never been attempted before.

Patriotism

This American largesse has helped to reduce, if not banish, misery in many countries. It has also contributed to reviving the economic muscle of some industrialized nations which have since strongly challenged the commercial leadership of the United States.

And this country still stands as a beacon of freedom and liberty. America is unquestionably the land of opportunity, the summit of dreams.

So what do all these facts add up to? Simply this: Every citizen should realize we have a country of astonishing strength, generosity and idealism. All of us should try to fortify these traits in the American character.

Patriotism isn't a spectator sport. You don't score any points standing on the sidelines.

There have been, and will continue to be, unhappy moments in our history. The whole world learns about them. It is such candor in the American open society that wins the admiration even of our critics.

In your everyday routine, Mr. and Mrs. America, you are in the world spotlight, whether you realize it or not. How you react in coping with your country's needs can influence this nation's fate for years to come.

This is one of the key purposes of the Honor America program — to try to persuade each and every American adult to examine his or her attitude toward today's problems.

Do you withhold judgment on national issues — some of which are very complex — until you are adequately informed on all aspects?

Are you willing to suffer small inconveniences to attend a meeting or discussion on community affairs?

If you have doubts about the character of your country, remember the words of President Reagan's inaugural speech:

"Our objective must be a healthy, vigorous, growing economy that provides equal opportunities for all Americans with no barriers born of bigotry or discrimination ... It does require our best effort, our work and our willingness to believe in ourselves and in our capacity to perform great deeds; that together and with God's help we can and will resolve the problems which confront us."

JOHNNIE HIGH will host the festival entertainment lineup with an "under the trees" show during the day. He will also give a performance after the fireworks display at dusk.

Johnnie High to headline entertainment

Entertaining is a business to some people. For others, it's more like a recreational activity. It depends upon the form in which it is presented.

Fourth of July Festival entertainment host Johnnie High considers entertainment as a way of life that incorporates both business and recreation and he puts all his energy and time to accomplish it successfully to his audience's and his standards.

The Grapevine-based musician believes that entertainment must be enjoyed by both the performer and audience, but to make it work and interesting for the audience, it must be treated as a business too. And that takes time.

Twelve hours a day, seven days a week is a normal workday in which High coordinates the weekly Country Music Revue show at Will Rogers Auditorium in Fort Worth. That involves lining up musicians to perform, publicity, writing detailed schedules for each performer of where to be during the performance, the key of the tunes to be performed, and the technical details of the show's sound and lighting systems.

He oversees ticket sales at his Grapevine office, takes care of all publicity including advertisements in newspapers, hotels, magazines, Country Music Revue Association mailouts, a mailing list to 14,000 people, and the monthly entertainment calendar which he coordinates.

This amount of work does not include the benefit shows he is asked to put on.

"I get an average of five calls a week to do benefits, and I have to be selective," High said, "but when it comes to Grapevine, if I have any time at all, I'll do it for Grapevine."

It is easy for those people outside the entertainment industry to consider musicians outside of Nashville, Los Angeles, or New York as hobbyists and High often comes up against those misconceptions. People tend to think he puts on his shows as a sideline job, but it is all he ever wanted to do. And he works meticulously making all his shows work.

"My daddy used to tell me if you enjoy it, work won't hurt you."

Dear Mr. Gage:

I was pleased to learn from Cindy Sherrell-Leo that Texas Historical Commission will be meeting in Fort Worth in 1985. As I indicated to Ms. Leo, we want you to know that you will have the complete cooperation of the Fort Worth Convention and Visitors Bureau in your convention coordinating and do hope that both of you will feel free to contact us at any time.

During our conversation Ms. Leo discussed plans to visit Fort Worth in mid to late August and that more than likely you will want to be included in our planning session. I'm sure that the two of you will maintain a line of communication, but I will also copy you on correspondence to Ms. Leo to assist you with staying abreast of our efforts.

Again, Mr. Gage, we are truly excited about the Fort Worth meeting and are eager to assist in making this your most memorable meeting ever. I look forward to meeting you and working with you in the months to come.

City approves resolution providing cultural funds

By T.G. SPEARS
Staff Writer

Grapevine organizations producing projects related to the arts and cultural activities are now able to seek funding from the City of Grapevine.

The city council adopted a resolution Tuesday allowing the city to provide grants to those organizations. The grants will be financed with proceeds from the city's hotel-occupancy tax.

Grapevine ranked twelfth among Texas cities last year in hotel-occupancy tax proceeds, earning $642,000, a 71 percent gain in such revenues over 1980.

In accordance with state law, Grapevine must expend at least 25 percent of those revenues, or $160,500, in promotional activities, although the council has not yet set a limit on the sum provided in grants.

Qualification criteria for the grants, however, is rigid.

The substance of the project may represent one of several, artistic areas as well as historical preservation and restoration, and other projects which promote the city as a destination for tourists and visitors.

The substance of the project must be deemed to be of broad appeal and contribute to the city's cultural identity or promote tourism.

Grants must be used only for direct costs involved in the project. Grants cannot be used to finance additional fund-raising campaigns for the project.

If a city grant is used to produce the project, no admission or attendance fees may be charged if those proceeds will result in funds being raised over the actual cost of the project.

Organizations must be non-profit entities, and must be able to show proof of their non-profit status.

If the grant is approved, recipient organizations or individuals must enter into a contract with the city which contains these qualifications plus additional provisions deemed necessary by the city.

Recipients must also maintain financial records which are open to audit by the city. These records must be maintained for two years.

The city may revue and evaluate any project at any time from its production to completion.

Upon the completion of the project, the grant recipient must provide a detailed, comprehensive financial record of the entire project to the city, including the management of funds from sources other than the grant.

Any promotional devices, written, oral or otherwise, must state that the project is funded in part by a grant from the city, and that the grant was financed through proceeds from hotel-occupancy tax funds.

The application procudure for the grants is relatively simple. An application form, provided by the city, must be completed and filed with the city manager.

The applications will then be reviewed by a committee consisting of three councilmembers, the Convention and Visitor's Bureau director and a designated member of the city staff.

North Fort Worth Business Association is sponsoring a benefit Stockyards street dance Tuesday to raise funds for the Stockyards District Association, Inc. Activities sponsored by KPLX Radio will begin at 7:30 p.m. with a happy hour followed by the street dance from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. in the east parking lot of the Livestock Exchange Building.

The event is open to the public. Admission will be a contribution to the Stockyards District Association, which is concerned with the preservation and orderly redevelopment of the Fort Worth Stockyards National Historic District.

Tax credits available for property renovation

Owners who rehabilitate historic commercial and residential rental properties according to U.S. Department of the Interior standards are now eligible for a 25 percent investment tax credit.

As part of the Economic Recovery Act of 1981, this provision creates major financial incentives to encourage the preservation and reuse of historic buildings. It makes preservation attractive to developers, investors, and merchants who have not previously been involved with historic structures.

In order to qualify for the tax benefits, a structure must be listed in the National Register of Historic Places or as a contributing structure in a National Register District. At the present time there are about 15 structures in Tarrant County listed on the National Register and there are two historic districts: Ryan Place on Fort Worth's south side and the Fort Worth Stockyards.

An historic sites survey presently being conducted by the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County will identify other structures that may be eligible for the National Register and thereby become candidates for the tax benefits.

To qualify for the 25 percent tax credit, there must be substantial rehabilitation work involved, exceeding either $5,000 or the adjusted value of the building — whichever is greater. In addition to the immediate 25 percent credit, an owner may also depreciate the total cost of the rehabilitation at a straight line over a 15, 35, or 45 year period.

Persons who lease historic structures for commercial purposes are also eligible for the investment tax credit provided that they have at least 15 years remaining on their lease and the work done meets Department of the Interior standards.

Older structures not listed on the National Register may take a one time investment tax credit of 15 percent for buildings 30 years old or 20 percent for buildings 40 years old. This work must also meet Department of the Interior Standards.

Persons interested in receiving further information may request the flyer "Tax Incentives for Investing in Historic Properties" from the Tarrant County Historical Commission, care of Duane Gage, Chairman, TCJC Northeast Campus Department of History, 828 Harwood Road, Hurst, Tx. 76053.

The Grapevine Convention and Visitors Bureau has made a $4,500 contribution to the Historical Preservation Council for Tarrant County. The donation will finance Grapevine's share of a county side historical survey which will gather information and assist the county in planning the use of its historical sites and structures.

Grapevine is one of the first areas surveyed. On the sit investigations have already been made and research of more than 160 Grapevine historic sturctures is underway.

The Historic Preservation Council, comprised of civic, historical and neighborhood groups is contracting with Charles Hall page and Associates of San Francisoco to conduct the survey. The firm's employees a walk or drive through each target area taking photographs, talking to residents and studying old homes and businesses which might be considered of historical value.

In addition to the Grapevine survey, the firm has surveyed the Fort Worth Central Business District.

The council expects to identify at least 1,500 historics structures in Tarrant County. The results of the study will tell each city what could possibly be designated as historical and what tax advantages might be available. Volunteer researchers are needed. Local families study roots

Wednesday, December 29, 1982 MID-CITIES-DAILY NEWS Page 3-A

By BOB FRANCIS
Daily News Staff Writer

Interest in family histories may have begun as a popular a fad of the 1970s, but now local librarians say the study of genealogy continues stronger than ever in the Mid-Cities.

The study of genealogy "became a lot more popular or received a great deal of publicity when 'Roots' was on television, but there was a large interest before that," said Betty Yarborough, Euless Public Library director.

For local residents, the Euless Public Library could be an excellent place to begin a genealogical study.

The library houses 800 volumes of genealogical material from all over the United States, she said.

"We have lots of things on, say, Virginia, Kentucky, the New England states, all of this sort of information," she said.

Eighty to 90 people use the Euless Public Library genealogical room each month.

Genealogy is considered one of the top three of hobbies in the United States.

"As we (the American people) move around we have become more interested in our origins," Ms. Yarborough said.

Hurst Public Library has several volumes of material including county histories and some family histories, including the Parker, Estell and Hurst families.

There are also handbooks on beginning geneaology research along with books on basic research, said Bennie Washuleski, director of technical services for the library.

"We're encouraging people if they have a family history to donate us a copy," she said.

The library has more than 10 family histories.

The Fort Worth library is one of the three major depositories for genealogical materials in the state, as far as public libraries are concerned, said Paul Campbell, staff librarian.

Fort Worth has been selected as the site for next year's conference of the National Genealogical Society, he said.

Campbell said Fort Worth's collection consists of "a good bit of New England material, New York and heavily southern, after the war between the states, as far as records are concerned."

Campbell said he has seen a growing interest in genealogy.

"Between 1,500 and 2,000 people sign the register in this department each month, so it's a busy place.

"A general interest in history has grown. I think the Bicentennial may have helped to start that," Campbell said.

The Federal Records Center in Fort Worth has a complete set of Census records from 1790 to 1900, he said.

Search for family roots requires 'homework'

For anyone interested in beginning a search of their family histories, Paul Cambell of the Fort Worth Public Library has some suggestions.

People just getting interested in family history should do their "homework," Campbell said.

"They have to talk to older members of the family and they need to know the structure of the family from the present back at least to 1900, better if they can get back to 1880 for family sources.

"Then you start using the U.S. Census for foundation for research. You find them on the census, you see the structure of the family, the ages of people, the places of their birth and so forth.

"Then you know where to look for other records like cemetery records, marriage records and various court records.

"In this country, outside of New England, prior to 1900 there are almost no vital records, birth and death records. So you have to use substitutes, like probate, church records," Campbell said.

Many of these items have been abstracted and published and area libraries have many of these books.

1982 ANNUAL MEETING
November 13, 1982

FORT WORTH'S 19TH CENTURY HERITAGE

Residents and visitors to Fort Worth are beginning to rediscover the city's 19th century heritage and the many landmarks of the Victorian age which are still evident. Renovation work is proceeding on the 1895 Tarrant County Courthouse; Sundance Square in downtown Fort Worth seeks to attract visitors with its Victorian ambiance; the Stockyards area of North Fort Worth explores the "Cowtown" roots of the city; elegant turn-of-the-century neighborhoods, including Elizabeth Boulevard and the Crestline area, are being rediscovered; and many institutions are enhancing Fort Worth's reputation as an art and archival center.

The Texas Chapter of the Victorian Society in America is pleased to announce its 1982 Annual Meeting to be held in Fort Worth on Saturday, November 13. The schedule includes several group activities as well as opportunities for self-guided exploration of the city.

10:00 A.M. - We will gather at the AMON CARTER MUSEUM, 3501 Camp Bowie Boulevard. After registration and a brief business meeting we will hear an introductory presentation on Fort Worth's 19th century heritage by Duane Gage, professor of history at Tarrant County Junior College and chairman of the Tarrant County Historical Commission.

11:00 A.M.-2:00 P.M. - At the end of the morning session, we will have an opportunity to view the current Amon Carter Museum exhibit on 18th and 19th century religious folk art of New Mexico and to tour the nearby KIMBELL ART MUSEUM. Lunch will be on your own with suggestions to be made of eateries in the area.

2:00 P.M. - We will reassemble for a tour of the 1899 EDDLEMANN-McFARLAND HOUSE at 1110 Penn Street, recently acquired by the Junior League of Fort Worth. The house occupies a prominent site above the Trinity River near downtown and with the adjacent 1898 POLLACK-CAPPS HOUSE presents a view of the lifestyle of Fort Worth's 19th century gentry. Because of the proximity to the downtown area, we will be given an opportunity after the tour to view some of the downtown sites and structures mentioned in Duane Gage's morning presentation.

4:00 P.M. - We are invited to a reception at THISTLE HILL, the 1903 Wharton-Scott House at 1509 Pennsylvania Avenue, rescued from demolition by Texas Heritage, Inc. Since our visit coincides with a show by the Fort Worth Chrysanthemum Society, this social time will be enahnced by rooms full of flowers. After the reception participants are free to partake of the many dining opportunities in Fort Worth.

REGISTRATION AND MEMBERSHIP RENEWAL (You may also register at the door, but we would like to have an idea of how many will be present.)

Center is tracing county's origins

Mention historical society and the image of a half-dozen prim and proper ladies and gentlemen sitting in a parlor around a table discussing the beginnings of civilization comes to mind.

Not so with Watauga's Historical Research Center, a 1-year-old organization dedicated to working in the field, talking to people and getting their hands dirty.

Frank English, the unofficial president of the 10-member group, said members have access to metal detectors, tape recorders, video recorders and cameras — much of it from his personal collection.

"We're very informal," said a bespectacled, bearded English. "And we want people who want to work."

as a library or just sit in on an few meetings are not appreciated by English, who by day works in the logistics section of Bell Helicopter Textron.

The center's next meeting is scheduled Jan. 5, when members will discuss plans for a project looking into Negro Cemetery Road (now called Old Denton Highway).

But springtime, when the barometer shoots up, is the time members jump into projects with full force.

That's when members actually can be found going through garbage cans in search of metal to oooh and aaaah about.

Organization activities include long conversations with older citizens, finding long-forgotten places and generally tracing the origins of Northeast Tarrant County.

Historical society officers installed

Mrs. Jean Wickman has been elected president of the Grapevine Historical Society for the 1982 year. Serving with her are Mrs. Betty Yancey, first vice president; Mrs. Catherine Terrill, second vice president; Mrs. Mary Virginia Simmons, secretary; and Mrs. Alberta Nettleton, treasurer. Mrs. Nettleton is the out-going president.

The Historical Society has changed its meeting time from monthly to quarterly meetings during the year. Dues of $5.00 per person or $7.50 per couple each year are due at this time. You may mail your dues to: Grapevine Historical Society, 231 Ball St., Grapevine, Texas, 76051. Meetings are held in the Community Room of the Grapevine Public Library at 307 W. Dallas Road.

The Historical Society, during the 1980 year, had as its main project the listing of graves in four area cemeteries: Grapevine; Bear Creek; Minters Chapel; and Parker. The listings were put on computer print-out and were sold for $7.50 per copy. Also, the society did some work on the historical Torian Log Cabin located in Liberty Park. Two doors in the cabin were extended due to lack of visibility in the cabin.

The Historical Society, along with the Grapevine Public Library presented an all-day seminar on "the preparation of oral history" and from this meeting an oral history of Grapevine was started. Dr. Ron Marcello of NTSU, Denton, and Thomas Friedlund of the Southwestern Library Association conducted the seminar. The Tourist and Visitors Bureau of Grapevine granted $2800.00 for the purchase of equipment and salary for interviewers for this project. Janis Roberson, librarian, and a committee of eight people are serving on the Oral History project, and to date two elementary schools — Donold and Miller, and the old Grapevine College have been researched and put on tape.

Mrs. Wickman said that the main projects for the 1982 year will be to complete the oral history of the early schools and to also include other items of interest of early Grapevine; to continue updating the graves in the four cemeteries and to print more computer runs; to do more decorating at the cabin at Liberty Park. The ladies are working on a quilt for the cabin; and will add more museum pieces to the Historical Museum at Heritage Park.

Remember to bring your pre-school children to the library storyhour every Thursday at 11 a.m.. A fun time is planned for the kids this year with new exciting books, films and puppet shows.

If you have any questions concerning genealogy, labels, or the storytime, please call the library, 488-0413.

April, 1982

Dear County Historical Commission Chairman:

Thirty years ago the Texas State Historical Association published The Handbook of Texas. Edited by Walter P. Webb and H. Bailey Carroll, this encyclopedia/biographical dictionary immediately became the most respected reference work on Texas ever published. In 1976, the Association published a supplement.

In September, 1981, the Association began work on a completely new, revised edition, a work of six volumes, to be published in 1995 on the occasion of the sesquicentennial of the annexation of Texas. By that date the first two volumes will be almost 45 years old, an age when most major reference works have been superseded by newer, more up-to-date editions.

The new, revised edition will be much more interdisciplinary and broader in scope than the original volumes. We hope to include an entry on all the significant cultural, physical, and historical aspects of Texas.

To accomplish that goal, and to make the new work as complete and accurate as possible, we are asking that you call to our attention all errors and inaccuracies, of whatever magnitude, you may have noted in the three volumes of the present Handbook. Please suggest new topics and entries which in your opinion should be considered for inclusion. And send us the names of individuals, if you know of any, who could successfully deal with those proposed subjects. We request that you post this notice and inform other persons, institutions, and organizations that this most important project is now underway.

The first phase of the enterprise will be the preparation, for general publication and circulation, of a booklet listing all tentative and prospective entries. Since we hope to have this publication prepared by early 1983, your assistance and input, and that of as large an audience as possible, is needed as soon as possible. Please be in touch with us, and send us your ideas and suggestions.

Sincerely,

Dear Sir:

Your recent letter concerning the proposed revision of the Handbook was a pleasant surprise to us. Coincidentally, we have been, for the past few weeks, abstracting and evaluating the articles in the three volumes which deal with Tarrant County. While some, particularly those in the Supplement, seem to be quite accurate, many contain factual errors and omissions.

We will be happy to cooperate with the TSHA in any way we can. The work you propose is extremely important and we will do what we can to furnish accurate, complete information about our county's topics.

As soon as we have finished making our abstracts, we will be in contact with you again. Has any decision been made about how specific your subjects will be (for instance, would you be as interested in a short, concise history of a Baptist congregation formed in 1846 as you would be in a Baptist minister who was regionally important)? I hope you can understand my question.

Any working outlines or guidelines you might furnish us would be very helpful as we prepare lists of topics to forward to you.

Yours truly,

Dear Mr. Patterson:

Thank you for your letter of April 20 regarding the revision of the Handbook. I apologize for my delay in acknowledging your letter. For the past several weeks I have been tied up working on budgets and I am somewhat behind in answering my correspondence.

I am highly pleased the Tarrant County Historical Commission will work with us on the Handbook. We want as much input as possible from the various County Historical Commission groups.

No final decision has been made about how specific subjects will be. The decision will have to be based on the relative importance of each topic in terms of its significance to the community, the region, or the state of Texas. For example, a Baptist congregation formed in 1846 that played a major role in a community, a region, or the state, I think, would be worthy of inclusion. On the other hand, however, the fact that a congregation was formed in 1846 might not in itself be significant enough to be included, unless perhaps it was the first such congregation formed in the state. A Baptist minister who was regionally important should probably be included. We are still working on the guidelines and hope to have those completed by the end of the summer. If possible we would appreciate having any and all suggestions the Commission might have for inclusion in the revised edition by early fall. Sometime in 1983 the Association will circulate a list of all entries that have been suggested up to that time. This will give us some idea of the scope of the work. We will have to limit the entire work to six volumes at about 1,000 pages each. Obviously, there is going to be some difficulty in ultimately determining what will go in the Handbook. The scope of the revised edition, since it is going to be interdisciplinary, will be much broader than the original publication.

The response to the project is excellent. Other organizations are expressing the same kind of interest as yours. We anticipate that there will be 4,000 to 5,000 contributors from around the state to the revised edition. The people of Texas will have a great deal of input into the new edition.

Grapevine newspapers announce sale

Metro-Tex Publications, Inc., publisher of The Banner, has been purchased by Grapevine Publishing Company, publisher of The Grapevine Sun.

The purchase was announced this week by C.C. Hall Jr., majority stockholder of Metro-Tex, and Roy Appleton Jr., vice president of Grapevine Publishing.

The final edition of The Banner was published Wednesday. The two papers will now be merged into a single newspaper, which will be published each Thursday and Sunday under the name of The Grapevine Sun.

"This will put us in a better position than ever to provide the kind of newspaper service the Grapevine community deserves," Appleton said of the purchase. "We welcome the readers of The Banner and encourage them to call us with any ideas on how we might make The Sun an even better newspaper."

Appleton said The Sun intends to work more aggressively than ever to be the Grapevine area's most comprehensive and timely source of local news and features.

Hall said the sale of Metro-Tex will benefit the community by providing it with an even stronger local newspaper in the future. He said The Sun has his support in its continuing efforts to contribute to the progress of the community.

"We're all looking to the future of Grapevine and we want to see the best community in the world become even better," Hall said. "Everyone can count on The Banner to make this transition period just as smooth as possible."

Appleton said one improvement that will be coming from The Sun in the very near future is a significant increase in its circulation. He said The Sun will soon reach every household in Grapevine, including apartments where it has not been widely distributed in the past.

The expanded circulation will make The Sun a more valuable vehicle for area advertisers, said Bob Burrus, a founder of Metro-Tex who sold his interest in the firm last year.

"I'm happy to see this sale," Burrus said. "It was something we were hoping to see years ago. I've always thought a lot of The Sun. It's a fine newspaper and it has a fine staff."

Burrus said Metro-Tex was founded in January 1977 as a means for advertisers to reach more area households. The original owners were Burrus, Ken Lynch and Mike Story, who served as the first publisher.

Burrus remained among the ownership when the company was purchased in 1978 by Phil Parker, Bill Hudson, Mack Jameson, Bill Crabtree, David Harris and Jerry Pittman. Sue Crabtree became publisher at that time.

Hall and Truman Burnett became stockholders in July 1979. Hall purchased the interests of Burrus, Parker, Hudson and Crabtree in 1981. Jim Brannan served as publisher from May 1980 to August 1981, when Pat Stinson was named publisher.

Grapevine Publishing Company was founded in 1971 when it began publication of the News-Advertiser. The company purchased The Grapevine Sun in 1977 and continued publishing both newspapers until 1980, when the two were merged to form a single, twice-weekly newspaper.

Grapevine Publishing elected to preserve the name of The Grapevine Sun due to its long and rich history in the area. The newspaper was founded in 1895 by Benjamin Richard Wall, who sold it in 1897 to J.E. Keeling. The Keeling family continued to publish The Sun until its sale in 1977.

The Sun was designated a Texas Historical Landmark in 1980 and has been called the "single most important source of Northeast Tarrant County history" by officials of the Tarrant County Historical Commission. A Texas historical marker is now displayed on the front of the old Main Street bank building now owned and occupied by Grapevine Publishing.

Since its purchase by Grapevine Publishing, The Sun has won numerous awards for journalistic excellence. The Texas Press Association named it the best small weekly newspaper in Texas for an unprecedented three consecutive years.

Vivian Cross is publisher of The Grapevine Sun and Ron Goetz is general manager. In addition to owning its local offices, the company employs 14 residents and purchases its office and photographic supplies from local firms.

Naming the Spring Garden Elementary School

Man close to family's heritage

Spring Garden school commemorates past

By BARBARA HOLSOMBACK
Star-Telegram Writer

On a chilly winter morning, against the backdrop of a crackling fire, Walter W. McCormick talked about the pioneers who struggled on the farms that are today's bustling shopping centers and subdivisions of Northeast Tarrant County.

McCormick, 83, should know about those early days.

Since a small child, he has listened to stories of how his great-grandfather, Samuel Cecil Holliday Witten, moved from Spring Garden, Mo., around 1848. Witten helped settle a small community that flourished in what is now Bedford and Colleyville.

He donated land for a school about 1865. The school was named after his old hometown in Missouri and became the community's center of activity. Fire destroyed the school about 1872, however, and within a decade the Spring Garden settlement had disappeared.

Spring Garden had been almost forgotten until the Hurst-Euless-Bedford school board decided to name a new school after the old school and community, McCormick said.

The Spring Garden Elementary School will open next fall in north Bedford. McCormick was among the descendants of the Spring Garden settlers who were introduced at the groundbreaking ceremony recently.

"At the groundbreaking, I was gratified that there was some recognition of the history and the participation (of) our family in the development of the community," he said. "I like to see some of this history being brought out."

McCormick can gaze out his front door to sense his family's heritage. He and his wife, Euless Mayor Pro Tem Willie Mae McCormick, live in a sprawling white-frame house on land his family has owned for at least 120 years.

At one time, McCormick owned 135 acres off Main Street in Euless but was forced to sell most of it because of taxes.

"I inherited some of it and bought the other," McCormick said. "Now we only own eight and a fraction acres that haven't been sold to Crow Development Co. They are now building houses on 49 acres to the north of our house. That development, by the way, is called McCormick Farm.

"Absolutely, it was hard to sell and see developments on what had been trees and woods."

But suburban sprawl can't take away McCormick's memories of a colorful life. Born in Santa Anna, Texas, he was 1 year old when the family moved to the land where his house stands today. But the family didn't stay long the first time. His father was a railroad telegraph operator and the family traveled in Arkansas, Louisiana and Texas before returning when McCormick was 14.

After completing the 10th grade in Grapevine, McCormick joined the Texas Pacific Railroad Co. and started years of roaming to find railroad jobs.

"I worked for several railroads," he said. "Back then, people who worked for a short time for various railroads were called boomers. I guess I can qualify for that."

McCormick's love affair with American railroads was interrupted only twice — both times by war. In August 1918, he enlisted in the Texas National Guard and probably would have gone overseas, except that World War I ended three months later.

"I was a buck private in the cavalry division," McCormick said. "It was real horses too, not tanks or jeeps or something like that."

In World War II, he served in the Transportation Corp of the U.S. Army in the northern part of India and ended up a lieutenant in 1943.

"We operated a railroad," McCormick said. "It belonged to the Indian government, but in that area there were a lot of what we called 'fifth column people.' It was a term used, at that time, for people who were in sympathy with the enemy, the Japanese.

"The railroad was not being run efficiently. Some of it was due to the fifth column people and some of it was the attitude of the Indians. They performed in a more leisurely manner than the GIs. In the first month, we increased the tonnage handled by 800 percent."

He returned to Texas in 1945. Three years later, McCormick moved back to the Euless property. By then, he and Mrs. McCormick had been married for 19 years and they had a daughter, Elizabeth.

"We built this house in 1952 and have lived in it ever since," he said.

A Tarrant Co. Commission Research Project led to the naming of a major new elementary school in Hurst.

Wednesday, October 13, 1982 MID-CITIES DAILY NEWS Page 3

School board chooses name

The new school in north Bedford will be named Spring Garden Elementary School, the Hurst-Euless-Bedford school board decided Tuesday night.

Spring Garden was the name of a school which existed in 1865 near the site of the new school.

Board members also approved funds for constructing Phase II of the building.

The bid accepted was 11 percent lower than projected costs. That savings coupled with the 50 percent savings on Phase I means an 8 percent savings overall, HEB communications director Nancy Meeker said.

Total cost for the school, scheduled to open its doors next fall, is projected at $2.4 million.

The board approved a citizen's advisory committee which will work on a rezoning plan for HEB elementary schools.

Trustees also approved a new employee health insurance plan.

Employees on the low option plan now pay $12.60 a month will pay $9.05 a month under the new policy.

Transport Life will carry the new policy. Insurance now held with Blue Cross/Blue Shield will be dropped.

Association of Texas Professional Educators representative Faye Griggs addressed the board and reported results of a survey conducted among its members concerning a proposed employee grievance policy. From the 203 members who responded 202 favored the policy and only one opposed it.

The policy remained tabled Tuesday night, although the vote to remove it from the table was closer than in the past, 4-3.

HISTORY OF THE SPRING GARDEN COMMUNITY

During the more than one-hundred, thirty years since its founding, Tarrant County has been the home of many small rural communities which flourished for a time and then succumbed to some pressure or circumstance which made their existence unnecessary or impossible. One such community, Spring Garden, gained its identity in 1865 with the founding of a school and seemed full of promise for a time, but within fifteen years a small country cemetery was virtually the only reminder of the school, church and civic life that went on there. It gradually began to be identified as parts of other, later rural neighborhoods nearby, and is today within the city limits of Bedford and Colleyville.

Spring Garden gained its name and the beginnings of its community identity near the end of the Civil War. In the early part of 1865, S.C.H. Witten proposed to a neighbor, Milton Moore (1828-1914), that a school be erected in their settlement, with the families in the community bearing the expense of its erection. Witten, using his own wagon and ox teams, hauled loads of his own farm produce to the pine mills at Jefferson, Texas. There he traded his goods for a quantity of sawn lumber which he hauled back to his home for use in the school.

The school was built on the southeast corner of the D.R. Teeter survey, and was completed in the fall of 1865. It was named after Witten's old home in Missouri, Spring Garden. Classes were soon begun with William W. Hudson, from the Birdville community, as teacher. Pupils attended the school from as far away as Jack and Collin Counties, Texas. Pupils from outside the community boarded with Hudson.

Milton Moore, the father of several Spring Garden students, plowed a furrow through the woods for two miles from his home on the Milton Moore survey to the school; this furrow was for small children to follow from Moore's neighborhood as they crossed the post oak forests on their way to and from school.

At one time, Dr. James A. Bacon conducted a thirty-five day "Rapid-Fire Grammar School" at Spring Garden which was attended by fifteen or twenty area teachers as well as by Spring Garden residents. John M. Moore, later County Treasurer of Tarrant County, attended the school and recalled that "More English grammar was learned by some of those who attended the 'rapid-fire' school than is ordinarily learned in a period of five or six times its length."

The Spring Garden school building served the area as a school, church and community meeting place until it burned around 1872. Some community functions continued for a few more years, in other buildings or homes at Spring Garden. A new school was built around 1873 at Bobo's Store, about one and one-half or two miles south of the Spring Garden site. Built on Milton Moore's farm, it was called New Hope. Several other area schools absorbed the Spring Garden students who did not attend New Hope School.

The decline of Spring Garden in the 1870's was probably caused by several factors, chief among them the fire which destroyed the school building. The competing crossroads settlement of Bobo's Store, two miles south of Spring Garden, was established in 1870. Bobo's Store gained a post office in 1877 and was named Bedford by its postmaster, W.W. Bobo, after his old home county in Tennessee. The southern parts of the Spring Garden neighborhood quickly became identified as a part of Bedford. The thriving school and Church of Christ at New Hope strengthened Bedford's ties to the old Spring Garden settlers as the 1870's progressed. In 1876, the families to the northeast established a county public school called Pleasant Glade, to which some of Spring Garden's people sent their children. To the northwest, the Pleasant Run community was growing. The last vestiges of the Spring Garden community seem to have disappeared around 1877 when the Precinct 3 Justice Court was moved a few miles away to Grapevine.

Work begins at site of new elementary school

By BARBARA HOLSOMBACK
Star-Telegram Writer

On a bright fall morning, the roar of heavy machinery moving dirt on a piece of property off Bedford's Cummins Road send a roadrunner and rabbit scampering through the bushes in a nearby field.

The small animals will have more than the work of construction crews to catch their attention next fall when the doors open at the new Spring Garden Elementary School being built at the site.

The 18th elementary campus in the Hurst-Euless-Bedford school district will serve the rapidly growing North Bedford area. Although work already has begun on the school, ground-breaking ceremonies for it won't be until 4 p.m. Nov. 16.

School officials estimate the elementary school will cost $3.6 million, part of the $8 million in bonds sold in September by the district. Voters gave their overwhelming approval last summer to the bond sale for construction of the school, junior high additions and other renovations.

"At the ground-breaking, I think there will be a sense of accomplishment that the school is being built, when you consider the economic conditions of our country, state and local community over the last 18 to 24 months," said Neal Adams, H-E-B school board president.

"It's certainly an accomplishment, on the part of the district as a whole, to have a community show that kind of support for a bond issue, knowing full well it was going to mean an increase in their taxes."

When the bond package was being promoted, voters were told it could raise the $1.24 per $100 valuation tax rate in H-E-B by 3 to 7 cents in 1982-83. Trustees recently voted to levy the same tax rate, but homeowners will pay higher taxes because of an average 26-percent increase in property values from county reappraisals.

The taxpayers, however, will have something to show for their money. The new 61,500-square-foot Spring Garden Elementary will be the largest elementary building in the district, and will have the capacity for 850 students.

When the school is opened, H-E-B officials hope it will relieve overcrowding in other parts of the district, especially at Wilshire and Bedford Heights elementary schools. Trustees are expected to decide later this school year how the district's boundary lines will be affected by the additional classrooms at Spring Garden.

"We are addressing a real need by building the new school," Adams said. "We are continuing a philosophy of neighborhood schools which the board believes in very strongly."

The completed elementary school will be one story with a beige brick exterior designed to blend with "the complete area including trees and the housing development it sits in," assistant superintendent of finance Elo Nohavitza said. "It won't be something that will sit on top of a hill and be a contrast. It's supposed to blend with everything in the area."

Architects Geren and Associates have designed the interior of the building to be suitable for the district's team teaching approach by segregating upper grades on one side and lower grades on the other.

The building also will be energy-efficient, divided into four sections "which can be heated and cooled separately," Nohavitza said. "If we want to use just one part of the building, we won't have to climatize the rest of the building.

Panel to study boundaries

By BARBARA HOLSOMBACK
Star-Telegram Writer

There is "no question" that the boundary lines for elementary campuses will be changed in the Hurst-Euless-Bedford school district for 1982-83, says school board President Neal Adams.

But, Adams said, the board's decision on where those lines will be set depends partly on the recommendations of a 24-member Citizen's Advisory Committee that will meet for the first time Oct. 26.

The committee will not only study how the elementary zones should be changed because of the opening of the new Spring Garden Elementary School in the fall of 1983, but will look at the boundary lines and the use of existing facilities throughout the district, he said.

A report from the committee will be delivered to the H-E-B school board by Dec. 17 so that trustees can study the group's recommendations on rezoning at its mid-winter

New elementary school will bear a historic name

"It's designed to cut down on utility costs."

Contractors on the school, Cope and Smith Inc. and Smithfield Construction Company Inc., are expected to have the school building completed by July 21 when "furnishings, carpet, playground equipment, teaching equipment and so forth" will be added to get the facility ready for students, he said.

The school board reached back into history to claim a name for the new school. In the 1800s, there was a Spring Garden community that covered Colleyville and the northern part of Bedford.

The center of activity in that community was the Spring Garden School that stood one mile north of the new elementary school site. The burning of the school in the 1870s and the development of Bedford have been cited as the causes for the disappearance of the Spring Garden community.

H-E-B trustees have credited Michael Patterson, a history teacher at Smithfield Junior High School, with doing the research on the Spring Garden community that led to the selection of the name for the elementary school.

HISTORY OF THE SPRING GARDEN COMMUNITY

During the more than one-hundred, thirty years since its founding, Tarrant County has been the home of many small rural communities which flourished for a time and then succumbed to some pressure or circumstance which made their existence unnecesary or impossible. Spring Garden gets new life

By BOB FRANCIS
Daily News Staff Writer

A ground-breaking will be held at 4 p.m. Nov. 16 for the new Spring Garden school, but it won't be the first time ground has been broken for Spring Garden.

Long before the cities of Hurst-Euless-Bedford ever thought about hyphenating together in a school district, there was a Spring Garden school.

"Spring Garden opened in the fall of 1865," Michael Patterson, a Texas history teacher at Smithfield Junior High, said. Patterson, a member of the Tarrant County Historical Commission, has researched early settlers in the community.

"Two settlers in the area, S.C.H. Whitten, who lived in Colleyville, and a neighbor who lived in what is now Bedford, Milton Moore, decided they needed a school in the area.

"They built the school building. They went to Jefferson, Texas and got the lumber. And they took farm produce and traded for lumber," he said.

The school was named for Witten's hometown of Spring Garden, Mo., Patterson said.

The building, like most buildings at that time, were used for other purposes as well. It was used as a chapel for a Church of Christ, Baptist and a Methodist church, and as a "peace" court which was a forerunner of the Justice of the Peace system, Patterson said.

William Hudson, an Englishman, was the first teacher at the school, he said.

In 1872 the school burned. And though the school reorganized and met after the fire, population had shifted south to Bedford and the school closed around 1877. In the 1876-77 school year there were 40 pupils, Patterson said.

And now Spring Garden will be the home again of reading, writing and arithmatic, or at least phonetics, writing and mathematics.

USING BIRDVILLE CEMETERY AS A SOCIAL STUDIES RESOURCE

by Michael E. Patterson Teacher, Smithfield Junior High School, and Member, Tarrant County Historical Commission

I. Introduction

Pioneer cemeteries are among the most interesting and least used of a community's cultural resources. Gravestones themselves, as well as the life stories of the pioneers they commemorate, can give students an insight into their own homes' places in the state and national history they study. Old cemeteries can tell social studies students of today many things about past ideas of life and death. In many instances, homemade gravestones are the only surviving examples of native folk art in an area. As an imagination stimulator, nothing can exceed the atmosphere of an old graveyard with its strange carvings, leaning and broken tombstones, and hundreds of epitaphs. Who has not read, for example, a century-old epitaph of a young man or woman who died in his or her twenties, and wondered how and why they died so young?

Tarrant County's pioneers saw virtually every event which has taken place in Texas and U. S. history since the days of the American Revolution. At least two of Tarrant County's founders saw the Revolutionary War with their own eyes, years before they knew Texas existed. Others of our founders here fought in the War of 1812, several of the Indian Wars, the Texas Revolution, the Mexican War, both armies of the Civil War, and every major conflict since then. Some lived their lives following the frontier, while others left settled town lives to immigrate to North Texas. They were gold seekers, adventurers, buffalo hunters, simple farmers, Indian fighters, shopkeepers, wives, mothers, husbands, slaves, doctors, loafers,... American history in microcosm has passed through Tarrant County. Many of its traces can still be seen in our graveyards.

II. Birdville Cemetery's Place in Tarrant County History

When Tarrant County was organized in 1850, Birdville was named the county seat. Many settlers invested heavily here, even donating land for public buildings in some cases. The settlers hoped to reap large financial rewards when Birdville grew. But in 1856, some Fort Worth residents, wanting the seat of government moved to Fort Worth's growing community, succeeded in getting a county wide election held to choose a new site. Fort Worth won by less than fifteen votes, and it was later discovered that some Fort Worth advocates had induced several Wise County cowboys to come and vote in exchange for a quantity of whiskey. Many more votes were cast in the election than there were voters in the county. Although the controversy raged for years afterward, the courthouse stayed in Fort Worth.

As the town cemetery of Tarrant's first county seat, Birdville Cemetery naturally holds the graves of many of the county's founders. Though it probably contains older graves, the earliest surviving readable headstone marks a grave placed in 1852.

Birdville was named for Capt. Jonathan Bird, the founder of nearby Bird's Fort. Bird's Fort, a blockhouse/stockade with some supporting buildings, was established in the fall of 1841. It was located on the north side of the Trinity River, south of present-day Euless's South Main Street. It was not located in present-day Birdville, as is often thought. The fort was abandoned in 1842, but was periodically used for two or three years afterwards. It was plagued with Indian problems, and several of its inhabitants were killed while going about their everyday business. In 1843, Edward H. Tarrant, for whom the county is named, and George W. Terrell, both representatives of the Republic of Texas, signed a major peace treaty with nine Texas Indian tribes at Bird's Fort.

III. The Evolution of Pioneer Gravestones as Shown in Birdville Cemetery and Neighboring Pioneer Burial Grounds

Pioneer gravemarkers changed as time elapsed, depending upon many factors for those changes such as availability of materials for homemade stones, the economic status of the deceased and his heirs, the difficulty or ease of obtaining professionally-made markers, and personal convictions and tastes. Generally, Tarrant County's pioneer gravemarkers fall into several recognizable classes:

A. Rough, unworked fieldstones were probably the first markers used here. Most now have no surviving inscriptions. They have been used in all periods, even to the present day.

B. Lettered, crudely worked fieldstones are improvements on "A." above. They were usually quite personalized, and sometimes are grammatical nightmares in stone.

C. Wooden gravemarkers were sometimes used by the earliest settlers in place of native stone. They have nearly all disappeared today, victims of rot, insects, or grassfires. Some examples in adjacent Collin County, Texas, made of bois d'arc wood, have survived to this day since being made in the 1840's.

D. Sandstones and limestones carved by talented amateurs or pseudo-professionals started appearing here in the 1860's. Two excellent examples in Birdville Cemetery are the Barkley stone (1863) and the Moody stone (1866). Tarrant County Historical Commission researchers believe the man who made these two stones was an itinerant stone carver. He apparently was an illiterate and could only copy inscriptions given to him. His own efforts often contained many phonetic spellings such as "Marh" for "March," "untill" for "until," "apear" for "appears," and even one instance of "Meory" for "Memory." His gravestones have been located as far west as Newcastle in Young County, as far northeast as Bells in Cooke County, and as far south as Acton in Hood County. Several of his stones were made as many as twenty years after the person they memorialized had died. Many examples can still be seen in Tarrant and Denton Counties. He worked in the 1860's and early 1870's, and most of his stones have carvings of anchors or stylized hands pointing skyward.

E. False crypts or burial cairns, large stone-enclosed grave coverings, were built by the pioneers here during the 1850's, 1860's, and 1870's. They are merely stone structures built over conventional ground burials. The custom of building them seems to have been brought to Tarrant County by settlers from the Southern Uplands. Fifty or sixty examples have survived in this county. Most are impossible to date exactly, and many cover the bodies of now-unknown pioneers.

F. Iron markers of various sorts were used here in the early 1870's and again around 1890. None of the 1870's type, which were vault-like grave covers with a memorial tablet, have been located in Birdville Cemetery. The latter type, consisting of an iron tablet set upright with a painted inscription covered with a piece of glass, generally are unreadable now.

G. Marble has been used continuously for American gravestones since the 1600's. Lots of examples from all eras of Birdville's history are present in Birdville Cemetery. They are often quite ornate when made in the last half of the 1800's, after which they gradually become simpler and less ornate. Generally, marble is a white stone which may have streaks of color present. It is fairly soft and was easily worked. Under some circumstances, older examples here are so weathered that they are no longer readable.

H. Granite, a hard, durable volcanic stone, began to see wide use for gravestones near the end of the 1800's. It was probably not used earlier because it was so hard and difficult to work. Granite stones with shallow lettering were tooled by hand. Those with deep, sharp lettering were made after electrically operated sandblasting equipment became available.

I. A variety of other materials, such as concrete, glass, and non-ferrous metals may also be found composing gravestones.

Note: Nearly all pioneer cemeteries contain unmarked graves of settlers who, for one reason or another, never received any marker at all.

IV. Pioneer Cemetery Customs as Shown in Birdville Cemetery

Many characteristics we take for granted as being parts of all old cemeteries are in reality not universal at all. They are rather continuances of Southern Anglo-Saxon customs brought here by the settlers in the 1800's. They include:

A. The cemetery fence is an outgrowth of a southern custom of trying to keep livestock off the graves of loved ones. Most cemeteries in the Midwest and New England were unfenced in pioneer days.

B. The ornamental gateway, called a lichgate, has its roots in Great Britain where most cemeteries have one as a formal entranceway used for funerals. People just visiting were expected to use a smaller, less pretentious gate. Some writers say the extravagent gate once symbolized the entrance to the world of the dead. Our lichgates are the vestiges of those large, formal entrances.

C. The east-west orientation of graves has a Christian religious significance, since the dead are expected to rise on resurrection day to face the east. Newer, company-owned burial parks ignore the custom. One interesting phenomenon noticed in cemeteries here dating from the early or mid-1850's is the presence of some graves laid several degrees off the east-west axis. Those "off-square" graves which can be dated all seem to be of about the same era, and may have been dug by pioneers who had no compasses and instead used the sun to determine compass directions.

D. Traditional husband and wife grave placement, with the husband on the wife's right, was followed by many of Birdville's pioneers.

E. Evergreen trees planted in the cemetery are traditional plants for southern burial grounds, and probably suggested eternal life to the pioneers who began the custom centuries ago.

F. Scraping of graves (removing of all grass and plants from graves) is a pioneer custom which still survives in many Texas communities. It was probably considered disrespectful toward the dead to allow grass to grow atop their graves, just as it was considered ill-mannered until the past few years to step on or across a grave. Some folklorists think graves may have been kept bare to retain the illusion of recent burial and recent touch with the deceased. A newer variant of this pioneer custom is the covering of a plot with gravel or concrete.

G. Mounding, or erecting and maintaining a dirt mound atop the grave, probably originated also from a wish to keep the grave looking "recent" and more in touch with the present.

H. Grave decorations or ornaments of various kinds are nearly universal. Some pioneer cemeteries contain unusual decorations such as furniture and personal items which belonged to the deceased, medicine bottles used in their last illnesses, etc. The use of shells as grave decorations is a custom thousands of years old. This custom has survived without appreciable change for 30,000 years in Europe, and was brought to North America several hundred years ago. Many pioneer folkways such as this are unknowingly destroyed when organized care comes to pioneer cemeteries.

I. Family group burials were once nearly universal in southern cemeteries. In newer cemeteries where grave spaces are sold and rigidly controlled, the custom has all but disappeared.

V. Pioneer Gravestone Symbols in Birdville Cemetery

The "Golden Age" of American gravestone art and epitaphs was coming to an end about the time Tarrant County's first settlers arrived. A few fairly standard pioneer gravestone symbols are present in Birdville Cemetery, however.

A. Lambs, with Biblical connotations, were especially popular on children's markers in the late 1800's.

B. Uplifted hands and index fingers pointing skyward began to be popular here during the 1860's. They probably symbolized the ascension of the soul to heaven.

C. Anchors, ancient Christian symbols of faith, appear on some of Tarrant County's markers dating from the 1860's and 1870's. The pioneer stonecutter who made the Moody marker (1866) was especially fond of them.

D. Shaking (clasping) hands, symbolizing earthly goodbyes and heavenly welcomes, were popular 19th century designs.

E. Doves, Biblical symbols of renewal and peace, were also widely used.

F. Bibles, both open and closed, became popular for gravestone decorations after the Civil War.

G. Crosses, now generally accepted as appropriate for gravestones, are conspicuously absent from this and all other pioneer cemeteries which were used by Protestant pioneers. They viewed crosses as symbols of Roman Catholicism.

Note: Soon after 1900, styles reverted to the much earlier simplicity of the late 1700's and early 1800's. Epitaphs, if included at all, became shorter and less personalized.

VI. Persons of Local Note Buried in Birdville Cemetery

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BARKLEY, 1822-1882, was a pioneer doctor, lawyer, community leader, and judge in Birdville. He was one of the most colorful and controversial people ever to live in the town. He came to Texas in 1855 after killing a man in self-defense, bringing with him his family and "Aunt Nan" Lawther, one of many slaves he had purchased and freed. Although he was very unpopular here during the Civil War because he opposed slavery, he still continued to help the families of Confederate soldiers who were away in the army. He was once kidnapped, taken to Gainesville, and nearly lynched because of his sympathies.

Barkley was appointed county judge of Tarrant County after the Civil War, and served in spite of the little support he received from the majority of ex-Confederates among the county's citizens. Once when a drunk man was firing his pistol outside Barkley's office, Barkley drew his own gun and went out to apprehend the man. He asked for help from several bystanders, but no one would offer to help until the drunk fell from his horse. He sometimes felt so unsafe that for a time he rode every day from his home in Birdville to his office in Fort Worth inside an escort of Negro Union soldiers (an especially irritating development to his enemies in the community).

After he retired from public office, he continued to practice law. Once, after representing a client in Wichita Falls, he was able to get a ride back only as far as Rhome in Wise County. He walked the rest of the way home to Birdville, and became chilled on the way. He developed pneumonia and died on Christmas Eve, 1882.

ALBERT GALLATIN WALKER, 1807-1882, a pioneer surveyor and newspaper editor, came to Texas before 1850 and by 1855 was publishing one of Birdville's two newspapers, the Birdville Union. The other journal, the Western Express, was published by John J. Courtnay. Walker and Courtnay soon became bitter enemies because of their stand on the secession of the South. Walker was a strong Union man while Courtnay favored an independent South. Courtnay vocally and in print favored moving the courthouse to Fort Worth in the 1860's, while Walker's heavy investments in Birdville's future made him violently oppose the move. The two men gradually became more and more vocal in their disagreements and their tempers rose. One day, after a particularly violent exchange of editorials directed at each other in their newspapers, the two men met and Walker shot Courtnay, killing him.

Walker was acquitted of the killing and continued to be an active leader both in Birdville and Tarrant County. He later served in the Texas legislature.

L. C. BARKLEY, 1846-1863, Judge Barkley's son, was shot to death on the streets of Birdville during the Civil War. His marker is a very unusual example of pioneer stonework.

JOHN BOONE, 1813-1897, a Birdville pioneer, claimed he was a descendant of Daniel Boone the frontiersman.

HENRY C. DAGGETT, 1820-1887, ran the first civilian-operated store at the military post in Fort Worth.

EDWARD HOVENKAMP, 1824-1886, an early-day lawyer, was the Tarrant County District Attorney during the Civil War.

SIMCOE POPPLEWELL, 1816-1879, had a store in Birdville in 1856. The ballot box for the 1856 election which decided to move the courthouse to Ft. Worth was kept in his store.

HIRAM CALLOWAY, 1822-1900, an officer in the Confederate Army, started an argument in Fort Worth which culminated in the deaths of two men, neither of them Calloway. A few months after the 1856 election which moved the courthouse to Fort Worth, a political meeting and barbecue was held at Cold Springs near North Fort Worth. Many Ft. Worth and Birdville people attended, and feelings over the recent election were still high. At the barbecue, Hiram Calloway, a Birdville resident, got into an argument with a Fort Worth attorney, A. Y. Fowler. Calloway pushed Fowler over a small cliff or ridge, and in falling Fowler broke his arm. Tarrant County sheriff John B. York refused to file charges against Calloway, saying that Fowler had started the argument. Quickly, a feud developed between York and Fowler. A few days later they met in Fort Worth, both drew their guns, both fired, and both fell dead.

ARCHIBALD FRANKLIN LEONARD, 1816-1876, founded a mill on the West Fork of the Trinity River a short distance west of where Precinct Line Road crosses the channel in south Hurst today. Founded in the 1850's, it became Randol Mill after numerous resales and partnership changes. A. F. Leonard was Tarrant County's first elected sheriff, having won his office in the first general elections held in 1850.

VII. Bibliography of Local History Materials Which Pertain to Birdville Pioneers

Ray, Thelma. The History of Birdville. Fort Worth, private printing, 1965. Any classroom study of Birdville should begin with this compilation of documents by a retired Birdville teacher.

Williams, Mack. In Old Fort Worth. Fort Worth, News Tribune, 1977. This large, picture-filled book contains stories and anecdotes from all over the county, and not just Fort Worth. It contains several factual errors but is useful in many respects.

Gage, Duane. Scenes from the Past: A Mid-Cities Album. Ft. Worth, private printing, 1975. A photographic collection and outline of the history of east and northeast Tarrant County from prehistoric times to the present.

Texas Writers' Project. Research Data Fort Worth and Tarrant County, Texas. These records include several thousand pages in several bound volumes of indexed reminiscences of Tarrant County residents.

Garrett, Julia Kathryn. Fort Worth: A Frontier Triumph. Austin, 1972. General county history, with considerable information about the county outside the bounds of Fort Worth.

Knight, Oliver. Fort Worth: Outpost on the Trinity. Norman, Oklahoma, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. General history of Ft. Worth and Tarrant County.

Pirtle. Fort Worth: The Civilized West. 1980. Quite useful for its photographs, it contains a few factual errors but is generally helpful.

Gage, Duane. The History of Tarrant County. 1980. An eight-part slide tape presentation of Tarrant County from prehistory through the Civil War. Most of the parts average fifteen to twenty minutes in length, and are accompanied by a typed transcript of the tape for use in discussion and outlines. The set is housed in the library at TCJC northeast, and may be checked out for use through the main circulation desk.

Tarrant County Junior College, Northeast Campus. Heritage Room Collection. Housed on the lower floor of the library building, this is a giant collection of Tarrant County historical material, artifacts, and photographs. There is an extensive card index to the collection.

Tarrant County Historical Commission. Duane Gage, Chairman. Office at TCJC-Northeast. The Commission maintains a large collection of historical documents and photographs. Especially useful are the compiled histories for each Texas Historical Marker in the county, which are in some ways the best sources of easily accessible information on their specific topics.

Time-Life Publishing Co. Old West Series. These books are especially useful for their photographs, and are excellent sources of popular history of many nationwide trends which helped shape Tarrant County.

Tyler, Ronnie C. and Lawrence R. Murphy, eds. The Slave Narratives of Texas. Austin, Encino Press, 1974. This book contains over three hundred actual interviews with former Texas slaves, several of whom lived in Tarrant County. The interviews were conducted during the 1930's under the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration.

Myres, Sandra L., ed. Force Without Fanfare: The Autobiography of K. M. VanZandt. Fort Worth, TCU Press, 1968. This interesting autobiography of a county leader who came to Tarrant County in 1865 gives good firsthand glimpses into post-Civil War life here.

Baker, Jonathan Hamilton. "Diary of Jonathan H. Baker." Original in custody of TCJC. Microfiche copies available at TCJC-Northeast. In 1858, 26 year-old Baker left Virginia to come to Texas. On May 31 of that year Baker came to Tarrant County and began teaching school three miles north of Fort Worth. He kept a daily diary for over fifty years, and visited Birdville often during the 1850's. His entertaining and literate diary contains much information about early-day Birdville.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram. Fort Worth's present newspaper, and its predecessors dating back to the 1870's, are on microfilm at the Fort Worth Public Library.

Atwood, E. Bagby. The Regional Vocabulary of Texas. Austin, UT Press, 1975. Atwood did a careful study of the vocabularies of many Texans and traced the roots of many common and not-so-common terms in everyday Texas language. His book is readable and entertaining.

Newcomb, W. W. The Indians of Texas. Austin, UT Press, 1973. This book is useful for its accounts of Indian groups who lived in Tarrant County. It is easy to understand and full of interesting anecdotes.

Jordan, Terry G. Texas Log Buildings: A Folk Architecture. Austin, UT Press, 1978. This is a useful and well-illustrated study of Texas pioneer homes, and would be especially useful for scale model projects in social studies classrooms.

Wigginton, Eliot. Foxfire series. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, series began 1972. How-they-did-it accounts and illustrations of the survival skills mountain pioneers brought with them to Tarrant County.

Brewer, J. Mason. Dog Ghosts and The Word on the Brazos. Austin, UT Press, 1976. Black folk tales of the Texas pre-Civil War and immediate post-Civil War culture. Most are centered along the Brazos west and south of Tarrant County, but they may be used as examples of the folklore of this area as well. All are quite entertaining.

Tomlinson. Lone Star Book of Texas Records. Revised annually in Fort Worth. This is a Texas edition of the Guiness Book of World Records which is widely available in paperback. It contains lots of interesting trivia items, including a story about a twelve-foot alligator which was caught in the Trinity River beside the Tarrant County courthouse in 1874.

Jordan, Terry G. Texas Graveyards: A Cultural Legacy. Austin, UT Press, 1982. The first major work on the cultural history of Texas pioneer cemeteries, most of its material on Southern traditional burial grounds centers in the Denton-Tarrant County area.

Do not overlook other sources which popularize local history and folklore generally. Many of J. Frank Dobie's and Fred Gipson's writings can give students a picture of pioneer life here, though they do not deal specifically with Tarrant County.

VIII. Activities for Students

1. Epitaph collections from pioneer gravestones can be quite interesting During the first half of the nineteenth century, and particularly when gravestones were homemade, some interesting thoughts were carved on stones. As professional stonecarvers moved in, most of the personal touches left the epitaphs. As time passed, they became shorter and simpler.

2. Rubbings of interesting stones or markers of prominent people make good bulletin boards during a study of local history. Most of the stones need first to be rubbed with florist's styrofoam to remove the moss. Metal brushes or sandpaper will permanently damage the stone. Large paper is then held on the face of the stone while a crayon is rubbed across it, creating an impression. It is generally better to "rough-in" the design at the cemetery and do some finish coloring on it later on a smooth surface.

3. Comparisons of the ages at death of Birdville's pioneers can give students a vivid idea of what child mortality and short lifespan was like.

4. Creative writing activities can be developed using a gravestone as a stimulus. Students can develop biographies, or rewrite local happenings complete with dialogue and details, such as the Walker-Courtnay fight.

5. Interviews can be arranged with descendants of some of the notable Birdville pioneers. These interviews can be tape-recorded or put on video casettes for classroom use.

6. Photographs of pioneer gravestones also make interesting bulletin boards. The time of day the photos are made can affect their usefulness and clarity. Some stones can be made more readable by chalking the flat surfaces, and then blowing the dust from the carvings. Ordinary chalk only should be used--the next rain will wash it away. Any wax-based or oil-based marker coloring will remain on the stone permanently.

7. Simple genealogies may be prepared by some students to show their ties to the pioneer days. Many students in the Birdville system today are descendants of the pioneers buried in Birdville Cemetery. Their families probably have photographs of the old settlers which will be interesting to your classes.

THE COURTHOUSE RESTORATION PROJECT

Despite escalating restoration/readaptation costs, Tarrant County Commissioners Court remains committed to the concept of restoring the historic structure as authentically as possible, considering future usability of the space and damage from past remodeling projects. Although projected costs exceed available bond money, it is hoped that donations from the private sector and taxes the county will collect during the last three months of 1982 can be applied to the project. Commission members Larry Landis, Kathy Livingston, and Dee Barker recently sat in on a meeting of the County's Courthouse Restoration Committee and learned that (a) the rotunda will be open from the main floor to the dome; (b) the stairs immediately to the west of the rotunda will be rebuilt; (c) one courtroom on the south side of the building will be restored almost to its original size and style; (d) the size of the proposed "Archives Room" remains as called for in earlier plans.

DID YOU KNOW....

In 1975 a consulting firm hired by Tarrant County Commissioners Court to study the county courthouse discovered what it termed a "dichotomy." It meant that the old stone courthouse presented two contrasting pictures. Inside, the consultants reported, the building gives a "message of neglect, anonymity, incompetence, rigidity and defensiveness." Outside, the image was one of "tradition, dignity, respect and power."

Hopefully the present restoration program will project those positive traditional qualities of dignity and respect throughout the structure and inspire those who will use the building - both official and private citizen alike - to perform their duties of public service and good citizenship in a manner that will be a credit to the dignified building and to the county's great heritage....

MARRIAGE LICENSE DISTRIBUTION CONTINUES

TCHC's project to distribute unclaimed Tarrant County marriage licenses, dating from 1876 to 1932, has resulted in the mailing of approximately 650 marriage certificates to relatives and descendants of couples who were married in Tarrant County but who, for one reason or another, failed to receive their certified licenses. TCHC mails the licenses to the first descendant or relative who requests available ones, on condition that the request is submitted in writing and includes a stamped self-addressed envelope. A contribution, to help with distribution expenses, is requested. The requests should include the names of the couple, date of marriage (if known), and a stamped return envelope, to TARRANT COUNTY HISTORICAL COMMISSION, P O Box 18331, Fort Worth, Texas 76118.

The next phase will hopefully involve a large area around the perimeter of the CBD.

I-30 ISSUE NOW UP IN AIR

Newly elected Fort Worth Mayor Bob Bolen is urging the FW City Council to pass a resolution urging a go-ahead for widening the overhead, while Mayor pro-tem Dick Newkirk is supporting a move by the Central Business District Association to accept a report that concludes that the financial benefits of a depressed I-30 exceed the additional costs of constructing a below-street level road by a factor of more than six to one. The highway department's proposed widening of the overhead expressway adversely affects the historic T & P Merchants Terminal Building and its Warehouse, The Fort Worth Main Post Office, the Fort Worth Water Gardens, the Fort Worth Public Market Building, Monnig's Warehouse Building, and stifles prospective economic expansion of the south end of the CBD.

CEMETERY CLEANUP BEGINS IN HALTOM CITY

TCHC and Tarrant County Black Historical and Genealogical Society are coordinating a project to clean up and restore the New Trinity Cemetery, near the corner of North Beach Street and 28th Street in Haltom City. This Negro cemetery has been in need of attention for many years. Haltom City citizen Edward John Rawlinson is credited with arousing public concern about the cemetery's condition.

Volunteers are needed on Saturdays (all day) and Sunday afternoons to rake, mow, pick up debris and weeds, spread fill dirt using wheelbarrows and shovels, chop down tree sprouts, and straiten grave stones. Relatives of persons buried in the cemetery are urged to clean their family plots as soon as spring weather permits, so that substantial work can be accomplished as soon as possible. Civic groups in and near Haltom City, and black organizations, congregations, and families are urged to participate. For more information contact Duane Gage (281-7860 or 282-5740); Lenora Rolla, Pres., Black Historical Society 534-1349; or Edward John Rawlinson, at 834-7204. A dumpster is being used every weekend, free of charge.

BENBROOK HISTORY PROJECT

In the spring of 1981, the fourth grade class of students in RISE (a program for gifted and talented students) at Benbrook Elementary School decided to apply to the Texas Historical Commission for a historical marker to be placed at the grave of James M. Benbrook, the man for whom the city of Benbrook was named. The marker project has been completed and a dedication for the plaque is planned for the spring. The RISE class also decided to write a history of the city of Benbrook, and their copyrighted work, Benbrook Yesterday and Today, is now being distributed. Congratulations are in order to the fine job done by this group of history-oriented (now) fifth graders, and their teacher, Alma A. Burnam.

POLYTECHNIC TOUR

Neighborhood Housing Services of Fort Worth, Inc., staffed by Barbara Durst, Director, and Monette Fugate, have developed a tour of the Poly community. The Polytechnic neighborhood gets its name from the old Polytechnic College which was established in 1891 and was the forerunner of Texas Weslyan College. The first settlers, brothers-in-law Arch Hall and Roger Tandy, moved here from Tennessee in 1851. A house built by Arch Hall still stands on Avenue E. By 1900, the population had grown stadily and within a few years an independent city was established with churches, schools, a bank, and a water system. Street cars, drawn by mules, went into Fort Worth, and there was an industrial area known as Jamestown.

The first citizens chose Polytechnic - known as "The City on the Hill" - because of its wholesome atmosphere, its proximity to the college, and as an alternative to the lifestyle of "Hell-s Half-Acre"in Fort Worth. The tour includes historic structures as well as rehabilitated homes assisted by Neighborhood Housing Services, which can be reached at 3301 East Rosedale, Fort Worth, Tex. 76105 (ph.536-8097, 536-8099.

GRAND PRAIRIE DEDICATES THE DR. H. V. COPELAND HOME - GRAND PRAIRIE MUSEUM

On Sat. March 20th the Dallas County Historical Commission and the Grand Prairie Historical Commission dedicated the Dr. H. V. Copeland Home and Museum historical marker. The white clapboard residence, which features narrow windows and a high pitched roof, is typical of early area farmhouses.

A native of the pioneer Watson Community in Tarrant County, now part of the City of Arlington, Dr. Copeland was educated at Barnes University in St. Louis and Fort Worth University, where he graduated with a medical degree in 1901. After practicing medicine in Euless for a year, he moved to Grand Prairie, then a small railroad town of 500 people. There he served residents of the surrounding rural area, often making calls on horseback. During his local medical career, which spanned more than fifty years, he delivered over 4,000 babies. He was a prominent community leader and was active in the First Presbyterian Church and the Sam R. Hamilton Masonic Lodge. He and his wife Frances Willard Watson Copeland were the parents of two children, Frances and H. Victor.

The Copeland Home is designated Grand Prairie's "Significant Landmark #6," in a project designed to encourage students to tour and study their community's heritage. Attending the dedication ceremony from Tarrant County were Duane Gage, Commission Chairman, and Pam Phillips, a descendant of Watson Community pioneers.

REPORT ON MAY 12, 1982 MEETING

At its May 12th meeting the Tarrant County Historical Commission approved unanimously a resolution expressing the Commission's opposition to the proposed Southwest-Northside Freeway, which (if built) would endanger a number of historical and cultural sites. Another resolution, authorizing the Commission to research, compile, and publish an Encyclopedia of Tarrant County History as its major sesquicentennial project, was also approved unanimously. The Commission also voted to participate in a proposed awards program, sponsored by various preservationist organizations, upon recommendation of the Awards Committee.

TWO NEW ASSOCIATES SELECTED

The Commission has voted unanimously to appoint Marilyn (Mrs. Michael E.) Patterson and Mr. Doyle Willis Jr., as Associates. Willis has been involved in preservation activities through the Historic Preservation Council. Marilyn is coordinating the Commission's 1982 scrapbook and is assisting with the Newsletter. The Commission is fortunate to have gained the talents of these two individuals.

JOINT MEETING OF DENTON AND TARRANT COUNTY HISTORICAL COMMISSIONS

The Tarrant County Historical Commission was well represented at the joint meeting of the Denton and Tarrant County Historical Commissions held at the Courthouse on the Square in Denton on June 3rd. TCHC members Frances Allen, Brent McPherson, Gilbert Anguiano, Duane Gage, Larry Landis, Mildred Spratling, Ruby Schmidt, Mike Patterson, and Marilyn Patterson attended.

The Denton County Commission presented a program on the proposed impact on historical preservation in northeast Denton County which will be caused by the proposed reservoir now being built there. After the meeting, TCHC members were given a tour of the museum in the Courthouse and were shown the upper floors and bell tower in the building while discussing mutual problems and solutions in courthouse restoration and repair. TCHC members also toured the new county archives facilities and discussed records management problems with the DCHC members. The joint meeting was a profitable experience for TCHC and we express our warm thanks to the Denton County folks for their hospitality.

TARRANT COUNTY COURTHOUSE RESTORATION CONTINUES

Tarrant County Commissioners Court is holding firm in its resolve to accept only a first-rate restoration of the county courthouse despite continually escalating costs. The projected date for completing the project is July 4, 1983. One of the unexpectedly expensive aspects of the project is the reconstruction of the west stairway, which was removed many years ago during one of the structure's many renovations.

COMMISSION SEEKS HELP FOR FURNISHING ARCHIVES ROOM

On June 28th Commission members Jeri Ballard and Duane Gage met with architect Ward Bogard and discussed the plans and specifications for the restored courthouse's Archives Room, which the Commission has been asked to furnish by the Tarrant County Commissioners Court. Donations of old photographs, manuscripts, small artifacts, etc., to be placed in display cases, are requested. Locked display cases, cabinets, book cases, etc., that will be compatible with the historic structure are also sought. If you know of someone who wishes to donate suitable items, please contact Jeri Ballard (732-0396) or Duane Gage (281-7860).

For research and reference purposes in the Archives Room we are seeking copies of published materials relating to Tarrant County history, such as Garrett's Fort Worth: A Frontier Triumph, Oliver Knight's Fort Worth: Outpost on the Trinity, and the three-volume Handbook of Texas.

ARCHEOLOGICAL SITES IN NORTHEAST TARRANT COUNTY TO BE STUDIED

Dan Prikryl, a graduate student at the University of Texas at Austin, has begun an extensive survey of Indian sites along Big and Little Bear Creeks in the northeast quarter of the county. Work has already begun in the Minters Chapel area, and several interesting artifacts have already been found on the surface of some already-known sites. A public meeting, open to all interested persons, has been set for July 15 at 7:30 p.m. in Grapevine at the Grapevine Police Department's Community Room. Residents who have found artifacts on their property are urged to bring them to the program. Mr. Prikryl and Larry Banks, archeologist for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and a research consultant for the Smithsonian Institution, will be on hand to answer questions and to give further information about the project. If you have artifacts found in this area and would like to learn more about them, please bring them to the meeting. Any interested persons of any age are invited. Later meetings at other northeast Tarrant County locations are also being planned as the program progresses. The meetings are being cosponsored by the Tarrant County Archeological Society and the Tarrant County Historical Commission.

"MEDALLION" SUBSCRIPTION FEE NOW DUE

The Texas Historical Commission has announced that, due to rising publication costs, a $5 per year subscription fee has been instituted for the THC newspaper, "The Medallion." Subscriptions are now being accepted; checks may be made payable to the Texas Historical Commission PO Box 12276, Austin, Texas 78711.

HORSE FOUNTAIN PROJECT "ON HOLD"

Upon the request of County Judge Mike Moncrief, the TCHC has assumed the responsibility of raising funds and talents to restore the humane association's horse fountain, the base of which remains at its original site on the southest corner of the county courthouse lawn. Erected in 1892, the watering fountain featured a monument with stone pillars and a bronze horse statue atop, which was razed because the monument had cracked and presented a hazard to pedestrians using the sidewalk beside it. The Commission is waiting to receive detailed architectural drawings that can be presented to interested groups and individuals whom, it is hoped, will wish to participate in the project.

On May 12 the TCHC formally adopted as a Texas Sesquicentennial project the publication of a historical dictionary of Tarrant County topics arranged similarly to the Handbook of Texas in format. It is hoped that the work will be a concise, reliable, usable historical reference on topics of both general and specific interest. Preliminary topic guidelines have already been prepared and more than one hundred entries are partially or fully completed. TCHC member Mike Patterson (ph. 283-2658) is serving as editor of the project. Persons with in-depth knowledge of local persons and traditions in northwest, southwest, and southeast Tarrant County are particularly needed to serve on the editorial committee.

RECENT FLOODS IN NORTH TEXAS UNCOVER GEOLOGIC TREASURES

Last November's torrents were hardships for most people, but for some they uncovered some amazing treasures. When Grapevine Lake roared across its spillway carrying away a large portion of road north of the dam and gouging out a canyon extending a long distance to the north, it uncovered two sets of tracks believed to have been made around 80,000,000 years ago by a "duckbilled dinosaur." The first dinosaur tracks discovered in Tarrant County, they were carefully removed by professionals and taken to the Dallas Museum of Natural History for further display and study.

Another recent paleontological discovery, in a muddy creekbed just north of the Dallas/Fort Worth Airport: a huge jaw and two giant teeth that once belonged to an imperial mammoth, the largest species of mammoths that once roamed North America. The giant - probably 15 feet high at the shoulder with tusks that measured up to 15 feet, roamed the airport area about 20,000 years ago.

TARRANT COUNTY CEMETERY TRUST FUND RECEIVES IRS TAX EXEMPTION

The TCHC received notification from the IRS on June 24 that a temporary tax exempt status for the next two years has been awarded to the Tarrant County Cemetery Fund. This fund, to be used in future years to maintain abandoned pioneer cemeteries in the county, will be administered by the County Judge upon recommendations by the TCHC. Tax-deductible donations to the fund may now be received by Leland H. Mundy, County Auditor's Office, 100 E. Weatherford St., Ft. Worth, Texas 76102. Checks should be made payable to the Tarrant County Cemetery Trust Fund.

FRANKLIN STREET IS OBJECT OF SEARCH

TCHC member Frances Allen is gathering data on Franklin Street, which is no longer a public street but is located in Heritage Park north of and parallel to West Belknap. Miss Allen is also interested in learning about any buildings which stood along the street or any families who lived along it. The street is listed in the 1907 Ft. Worth City Directory.

TEXAS HISTORICAL COMMISSION SEEKS POST OFFICE BUILDING DATA

The U.S. Postal Service, in compliance with federal regulations, is conducting a historical resource survey of its properties in Texas. The survey includes the collection of information on post office buildings 50 years old or more, and an assessment by the Post Office Dept. of the historical merits of these structures.

The THC is asking its member Commissions to take a look at Post Office buildings within their counties, and suggests as local projects the photographing of appropriate structures and their surroundings to document their current settings and appearances. If possible, the THC invites the filing of black and white 8x10 or 5x7 glossy photos with the State THC office, together with a summary of community feelings about the buildings and their contributions to the architectural character and heritage of their communities.

These photographic and written records may become especially valuable should federal findings indicate the need for extensive renovation or demolition of existing buildings.

ARCHIVES COMMITTEE ACTIVITIES

Archives Committee Chairman Ruby Schmidt has prepared a questionaire to be sent out to libraries, organizations, and individuals requesting information on their holdings that include materials on Tarrant County history. This is an important step in the project to prepare a published bibliography of Tarrant County sources, citing the location of Tarrant County materials and reporting on content, accessibility, etc....

A copy of the 1860 tax list for Tarrant County has been given to the Commission by Six Flags Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution...

Ruby Schmidt has abstracted Tarrant County materials that have been published in the wonderful Footprints, produced by the Fort Worth Genealogical Society. Included are cemetery lists from over fifteen Tarrant County cemeteries; first post offices and postmasters from Tarrant County; 1854 Tarrant County school census; Tarrant County jury list of 1853; naturalization requests 1850-1874; registered Tarrant County voters of 1867, and many other materials of great research value.

MICROFICHE PROJECT CONTINUES

The Fort Worth Public Library has graciously authorized the Tarrant County Historical Commission to get the multi-volume Federal Writers Project volumes on Fort Worth and Tarrant County history microcopied and made available for area libraries, schools and universities. The project is to be funded from the anonimous contribution granted to the Commission a few months ago, a contribution to preserve through microcopying many "only existing" copies of Tarrant County materials. This project follows the successful completion of the microfilming of the Fort Worth Press (1927-1944) and Commercial Recorder.

THESES AND DISSERTATIONS

Commission member Gilbert Anguiano is proceeding in his project to compile a list of all college theses and dissertations that have been completed on topics that relate to Tarrant County history. This is an important part of the project to publish a bibliography of Tarrant County sources. It is anticipated that the list of theses and dissertations will be completed by the end of this year. Go for it, Gilbert!

THE TITLE COMPANY ABSTRACTS

UTA graduate student Monte Herridge, under the archives program directed by Dr. Charles Colley, has applied himself in an interne's project to complete the sorting of the large collection of title company abstracts now housed in TCHC's storage room in the Northeast Subcourthouse. Herridge has already sorted the voluminous collection into original survey arrangement, alphabetically stacked. The overall project is being coordinated by Elizabeth Schober and Mildred Spratling, who have already abstracted a significant amount of biographical information (copies of wills, etc.) from the documents.

BEN F. ALLEN REAL ESTATE RECORDS

Historical Preservation Committee Chairman Carol Roark has coordinated a project to have the TCHC receive a donation of the Ben F. Allen Real Estate Company records. The firm, which served Fort Worth and Tarrant County from 1911 to 1929, maintained records which give a written description of property offered for sale, including a list of the improvements. The owner has decided to donate the records to the Commission with the understanding that we will protect them and make some type of arrangement whereby they can be made available to the public for research purposes.

NILES CITY HISTORICAL MARKER DEDICATED APRIL 3

A large group turned out April 3 to help the North Fort Worth Historical Society dedicate the marker remembering Niles City, now in North Fort Worth. Several dignitaries, including Fort Worth mayor Bob Bolen and Congressman Jim Wright attended the ceremony. Incorporated in 1911, Niles City was once known as the "Richest Little Town in the World," because of its small size and the large number of businesses located there including major meat packing firms, the Fort Worth Stockyards, two grain elevators, a cotton seed company, and a petroleum refinery and pipeline plant. Niles City became a part of Ft. Worth in 1923.

EMANUEL HEBREW REST CEMETERY HISTORICAL MARKER DEDICATED

On April 18 the Texas Historical Marker at Ft. Worth's Emanuel Hebrew Rest Cemetery was dedicated by a large group of descendants of the pioneers buried there, members of the Jewish community, and other interested citizens. Members of both the Congregation Ahavath Sholom and the Beth-El Congregation took part in the dedication. TCHC was represented by Duane Gage, Ruby Schmidt, Frances Allen, Marilyn Patterson, and Mike Patterson. The marker, beside John Peter Smith Hospital at the cemetery gates, reads: "Fort Worth civic leader John Peter Smith donated land at this site in 1879 for use as a cemetery to serve the early Jewish residents of the city. Maintenance of the grounds was first provided by the Emanuel Hebrew Association, which was started by local families. The earliest marked grave is that of a child, Leah Kaiser, who died in 1879. Under control of Congregation Beth-El since 1962, Emanuel Hebrew Rest Cemetery is the burial site of many prominent business, professional, and civic leaders of Fort Worth's Jewish Community.

WILLIAM L. HURST, TOWN FOUNDER, HONORED

The Texas Historical Marker honoring the founder of Hurst was dedicated on April 18 at the Hurst City Hall before a crowd of more than 200 descendants and visitors. Approximately one hundred of Hurst's direct descendants were on hand for a group picture taken after the ceremony. Several had traveled from other states just to attend the dedication. The marker reads in part: "A native of Tennessee, William Letchworth Hurst (1833-1922) served in the Confederate Army during the Civil War...In 1870 Hurst and his wife Mary Lynch...joined other residents of Claiborne County, Tennessee who had migrated here... In 1903 he granted a right of way across his farm for the construction of a Rock Island Railroad...In exchange, the company named a rail stop and depot for him...Later it became the town of Hurst...Hurst was the father of fourteen children and over 100 grandchildren." TCHC wishes to thank Hurst Mayor Bill Souder for his sponsorship of the project. Special thanks also go to the Hurst City staff for their support in making the dedication service one of the largest ever in Tarrant County. Several TCHC members attended.

MOUNT GILEAD CEMETERY HISTORICAL MARKER DEDICATED

On April 25 the Texas Historical Marker for Mount Gilead Cemetery near Keller was dedicated. The inscription reads: "This burial ground originally served a pioneer settlement of related families who migrated to the area from Missouri in 1847 as members of the Peters Colony. They were headed by a widow, Permelia Allen (d.1866) who is buried here in an unmarked grave. This tract, adjacent to the Mount Gilead Baptist Church and school, was first owned by her sons-in-law Daniel Barcroft (1812-1881) and Iraneous Neace (1816-1879). The earliest marked gravesite is that of William Joyce (1836-1854). Homemade grave markers here reflect the pioneer lifestyle of the early settlers." TCHC member Mike Patterson emceed the program and gave the history of the cemetery during the program. The TCHC awarded a plaque to Cemetery Association president Philip A. White in recognition of his many hours of work in restoring the cemetery. About sixty persons attended the ceremony, including a reporter from the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

TOMLIN CEMETERY MARKER PLACED

A large group of descendants of the Solomon Tomlin family of Arlington joined other interested citizens on May 16 to dedicate the Texas Historical Marker for the Tomlin Cemetery. The TCHC was represented at the dedication service by Duane Gage, Ruby Schmidt, Marilyn Patterson, and Mike Patterson. The marker inscription reads: "This cemetery was first used in the 1870's by the Wilkinsons, a pioneer family whose graves are marked by clusters of rocks. Members of the Angel family are also buried here. The oldest dated gravestone is that of Virginia native, Solomon Tomlin (b. 1825), a horseman and farmer who migrated with his family to Texas in the 1860's. He died on July 9, 1884. His son James Tives "Buck" Tomlin (1852-1934), a noted breeder of fine racing horses, bought the property in 1888. It has since been designated to serve the descendants of the Tomlin family."

AZLE SCHOOLS HONORED

A Texas State Historical Marker honoring the schools in Azle, Texas was unveiled in Azle on May 20. Among those invited to attend the ceremony was Hon. Jim Wright, Speaker of the U. S. House of Representatives. The TCHC especially wishes to recognize and thank B. J. Clark and Mrs. B. Carter of Azle for their support of the marker program in northwest Tarrant County. The newly erected marker reads: "According to local tradition, pioneer settler J. G. Reynolds started the first area school in the 1850's. Early classes were held in log cabins and in the Ash Creek Baptist Church building. Despite interruptions caused by Indian attacks and the Civil War, the Azle schools grew through consolidation with such nearby schools as Promised Land, Steele, Slover, Sabathany, Liberty, Briar, Bluff Springs and a local college started by William Lipscomb. An independent district since the 1950's, the Azle School system serves as a reminder of the community's pioneer heritage."

WEST FORK UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AND FORD CEMETERY MARKERS DEDICATED IN GRAND PRAIRIE

On Sunday afternoon, May 23, two Historical Markers were dedicated in Grand Prairie. Among the dignitaries who attended the ceremony was Arlington mayor Pro Tem Carolyn Snider. West Fork Presbyterian Church was organized in 1870 and served much of the surrounding area as a school meeting place as well during the early years. Nearby, the Ford Cemetery, begun during the 1850's, holds many unique examples of pioneer stonecutting.

MAN HOMESTEAD IN MANSFIELD BECOMES HISTORIC LANDMARK

On May 29 a ceremony was held in Mansfield, sponsored by the Mansfield Historical Society, to dedicate the Texas Historical Marker at the Ralph Man Homestead. The marker inscription reads: "A native of South Carolina who came to Texas in the 1850's, Ralph Saniford Man (1825-1906) was one of the founders of Mansfield. The town was named for Man and his brother-in-law and business partner Julian Feild. The two men operated a steam-powered grist mill that supplied grain to the Confederacy during the Civil War (1861-1865) and later to U.S. troops at Fort Belknap and Fort Griffin. Man built the original log portion of this home for his family about 1866 and later added the brick rooms. He donated land for the Mansfield Cemetery, where his grave is located."

NORTHEAST TARRANT COUNTY HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Paul Davidson, Heritage Room director at TCJC-Northeast and newly-elected vice-president of the society, is continuing to work on exhibits in the Heritage Room and is working to make the TCJC local history collection more accessible and readily usable for area students and researchers.

MARKER DEDICATED AT MOUNT GILEAD BAPTIST CHURCH

On Sunday, June 27, about one hundred twenty-five persons attended the dedication ceremony of the marker for Keller's Mount Gilead Baptist Church, the second oldest religious body in Tarrant County. The TCHC was represented at the ceremony by Duane Gage and Mike Patterson. The marker inscription reads: "The earliest religious meetings here began in the late 1840's as part of Lonesome Dove Baptist Church. The Mt. Gilead congregation was chartered in 1850 under the direction of the Rev. John Allen Freeman (1821-1919) with 8 members, including 2 slaves. It was the first church started after the formation of Tarrant County in 1849. Early services were held in homes and in a log schoolhouse at this site on land owned by Daniel Barcroft (1812-1881). Except for a time in the late 1870's and early 1880's when meetings were held elsewhere, the church has worshiped at this site."

CITY FOUNDER JAMES M. BENBROOK IS HONORED BY HISTORICAL MARKER

On Sunday afternoon, May 30, the Historical Marker commemorating Benbrook's pioneer, James M. Benbrook, was dedicated by a group of about sixty persons. Benbrook mayor, Jerry Dunn, took part in the ceremony, and recognized the outstanding work done by Mrs. Alma Burnam and her RISE class from the Benbrook Elementary School. The students, Jason Coward, Natasha Joseph, Mark Marquart, Michelle Mowry, Mark Robertson, Chad Slate, and Tracy Spence, began work on the project nearly two years ago. They researched and wrote the marker application themselves, and directed the final dedication service as well. The marker inscription reads: "James M. Benbrook (1831-1907). In 1876 Indiana native James M. Benbrook brought his family to this settlement, then known as Marinda. A veteran of the Union Army during the Civil War, he became a prominent area farmer and landowner. In 1880 when rail lines were completed here and a depot was constructed, the community was renamed Benbrook in his honor by the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company. Twice married, Benbrook was the father of six children." The ceremony received television news coverage on Dallas-Fort Worth Channel 5.

SPRING GARDEN COMMUNITY HISTORICAL MARKER INSTALLED

TCHC members installed the Historical Marker commemorating Spring Garden Community on June 1. This vanished pioneer settlement was centered along present-day Cheek-Sparger Road in present-day Colleyville and Bedford. The marker inscription reads as follows: "The first permanent settler to this area was Samuel Cecil Holiday Witten of Spring Garden, Missouri, who came here in 1854. In 1865, with Milton Moore, he built a schoolhouse here which was named for his Missouri home. The building also served as a chapel and meeting hall. Once the site of churches, a grange, and a justice of the peace court, Spring Garden declined in the 1870's because of a destructive schoolhouse fire and the nearby development of Bedford. Only the pioneer burial ground at this site marks the location of the early settlement."

COUNTY HISTORICAL MARKERS AWAIT FUNDING

The Tarrant County Historical Commission is holding the following completed marker applications pending the location of a sponsor to finance them:

Glassco School, a pioneer school in Bedford which operated during the 1870's-1890's.

Ayres Cemetery, located in east Fort Worth, containing the graves of several Ft. Worth founders.
Smithfield Cemetery, in North Richland Hills, with graves beginning in the 1870's.
Kiowa Raid on Walnut Creek, site of an 1867 Indian raid a few miles north of Azle.
West Fork Baptist Assn., organized in Birdville in 1855.

Each marker costs $325.00, made payable to Texas Historical Commission.

MARRIAGE LICENSE DISTRIBUTION PROJECT CONTINUES

TCHC's project to distribute unclaimed Tarrant County marriage licenses, dating from 1876 to 1932, continues to draw requests from relatives or descendants of couples who were married in Tarrant County. TCHC mails the licenses to the first descendant or relative who requests available ones, on condition that the request is submitted in writing and includes a stamped self-addressed envelope. A contribution, to help with expenses, is requested. The requests should include the names of the couple, date of marriage (if known), and a stamped return envelope, to TARRANT COUNTY HISTORICAL COMMISSION, P O Box 18331, Fort Worth, Texas 76118.

The THC recently was notified that Texas has received $427,782 as its part of the 1982 National Historic Preservation Fund. To date, the THC has allocated $80,000 of that amount toward various projects throughout the state, and two Tarrant County projects have received funding. A $25,000 grant was made to the Historic Preservation Council of Tarrant County for its project to conduct a countywide historical survey, and a $7,500 grant was earmarked for theEddleman-McFarland House in FortWorth.

COUNTY HISTORICAL SURVEY UPDATE

The Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County has finished the required research for completing the first phaze of the important countywide survey of historic sites and structures, and awaits the final report from Charles Hall Page and Associates of San Francisco. The first phaze, which includes the City of Grapevine and the Fort Worth Central Business District, required extensive research that was ably coordinated by Dee Barker, Mike Collins, and Marty Craddock. Thanks to them, the completed survey will be a work of high quality and usefullness, if their examples are followed.

1982 DESIGNER SHOWHOUSE ANNOUNCED

The HPCFTC has announced that the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Dupree at 4926 Crestline Road has been selected as Fort Worth's 1982 Showhouse. The showhouse, scheduled to open Oct. 9 to 17, will display the talents of several local designers. Each will design one room. The Georgian home on the bluff overlooking the Trinity was built by John F. Staub in 1928 for John P. King and his wife Lorene. Later the home was purchased by William McFadden. The Duprees purchased the home about fifteen years ago.

Nelda Mills, 1982 Showhouse Chairman, is establishing committees and she is seeking volunteers. Call the Council office at 338-0267 if you wish to participate. Member organizations of the Council are already selling advance tickets. A new feature in 1982 will be a tea room on the Showhouse grounds which will be organized and operated by the Junior League of Fort Worth.

TEXAS FAMILY LAND HERITAGE PROGRAM STILL TAKING 1982 APPLICATIONS

Each year the Texas Dept. of Agriculture seeks to honor those families in Texas who have, for a century or more, continuously owned and farmed a single tract of land. Applications for this year will be accepted through August 15. Further information and application forms may be obtained from the Texas Dept. of Agriculture, Family Land Heritage Program, PO Box 12847, Austin, Texas 78711, or from the county judge's office. NORTH SIDE'S THANNISCH BUILDING TO BECOME LUXURY HOTEL FOR STOCKYARDS AREA

Tom Yater of Alvarado and Marshall Young of Cleburne recently purchased the Thannisch Building at the corner of North Main and Exchange in North Fort Worth. Both men say they plan to retain the historical characteristics of the building as much as possible while renovating the hotel to accomodate 52 rooms of guests. The lower floor will contain a restaurant and lounge. After final plans are completed and reviewed, the developers expect to spend nine months to one year in completing construction and remodeling work.

STOCKYARDS DISTRICT ASSOCIATION FORMED

A group of property owners, business executives, and community leaders have banded together to form the Stockyards District Association, a non-profit organization which will seek to oversee the preservation and orderly development of the Ft. Worth Stockyards National Historic District. Jody Grant, president of the Fort Worth National Bank is the organization's chairman.

HISTORIC MITCHELL CEMETERY ON FORT WORTH'S NORTH SIDE IS OBJECT OF SEARCH

Fort Worth's earliest Anglo burial ground lies forgotten and indistinguishable in North Fort Worth south of 28th Street and west of Decatur Avenue, between two rail lines. Begun in the late 1840's, it contains the graves of some of Fort Worth's first and most notable early citizens, including Sheriff John B. York who was killed in a gunfight on the streets of Fort Worth before the Civil War. The last of the burial ground's once numerous gravestones was taken down several years ago. The TCHC is now actively engaged gathering information about the cemetery and the pioneer families who used it, and would be happy to hear from anyone having data which will help. Families known to have used the cemetery include York, Gilmore, Mitchell, Musick, and Anderson. Persons with information are asked to contact Duane Gage at 281-7860 or Mike Patterson at 283-2658.

EDDLEMAN-McFARLAND HOUSE OPENS ON JUNE 1

At last the stately Victorian mansion at 1110 Penn is open to the public for the first time since it was built just before the turn of the century. The Junior League of Fort Worth, Inc., after many months of work, has opened the lower floor to let visitors see Fort Worth history as it was mirrored in the lives of the house's first occupants. The bedrooms upstairs have been utilized as offices for the Junior League, Mayfest, and the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County. As is the case in many restoration projects of this scale, work is progressing in stages. Tours are scheduled by appointment for groups of six or fewer, but individuals who wish to see the house may come to the door at any time during business hours and they will be given a tour if it will not interfere with a scheduled group at the time. Admission is $2 per person. Reservations may be made by calling Nancy Brackett at 332-5875.

DID YOU KNOW...That as late as the 1870's large live alligators were caught in the West Fork of the Trinity at the foot of the Courthouse bluff?

HANDBOOK OF TEXAS TO BE REVISED AND ENLARGED

The TCHC has been contacted by the Texas State Historical Association asking for our input and help in an ambitious project to publish a six-volume interdisciplinary revision of The Handbook of Texas. TSHA hopes to have available for publication a preliminary list of topics by 1983, so that research on specific topics can begin. Final publication is set for 1995, the sesquicentennial of the annexation of Texas. TCHC has pledged to help by researching and carefully documenting as many Tarrant County topics as possible, as well as by reviewing and correcting the items in the present Handbook which relate to Tarrant County.

PHASE ONE OF HISTORICAL SURVEY IS COMPLETED

The countywide historical survey of pre-1945 structures and historical resources has been completed by the Historic Preservation Council. Surveys of the City of Grapevine and of the Central Business District of Fort Worth have been submitted to the Texas Historical Commission. The information now compiled on those areas provide local preservationists valuable data to promote the establishment of historic districts, National Register Nominations, state landmark designations, and adaptive use of older buildings. The community owes special thanks to Marty Craddock, TCHC representative to the Council, who has chaired the Council's survey committee this year; and to Dee Barker, TCHC member, who has served on the survey committee since its inception. Their efforts and achievements in this first phase are far beyond the normal level of volunteerism!

I-30 EXPANSION PROJECT DELAYED

According to the Fort Worth News-Tribune, work on widening the Interstate 30 Overhead expressway through downtown Fort Worth will be delayed because the state highway department presently lacks funds to apply to the project. The controversial widening to nine lanes is still being fought behind the scenes by Fort Worth leaders and preservationists who favor a depressed throughway instead of an overpass, which threatens several state landmarks and National Register structures.

HORSE FOUNTAIN PROJECT CONTINUES

COURT RULING FAVORS DESTRUCTION OF A PIONEER CEMETERY

A South Dakota Court has ruled in favor of developers in a case involving the destruction of a pioneer cemetery. The judge concluded that human remains do not constitute a cemetery, and since the site in question was not maintained, "the land has lost its sacred character." Fearing that the decision could open other abandoned cemeteries to commercial development, a group of South Dakota historians and genealogists are supporting a court appeal of the ruling.

ELIZABETH BOULEVARD RECEIVES TEXAS STATE HISTORICAL MARKER

On July 4, U.S. Rep. Jim Wright participated in the dedication of the Texas Historical Marker commemorating Elizabeth Boulevard. The marker was placed at the Ryan Place gates, at the corner of Elizabeth Boulevard and College Avenue. The ceremony, sponsored by the Ryan Place Improvement Association, was the culmination of a day of July 4 activities. The marker inscription reads: "This Boulevard, named for the wife of developer John C. Ryan, was designed as the first phase of a residential district known as Ryan Place. Elaborate entry gates and the first house, the W. T. Fry home at 1112 Elizabeth, were built in 1911. Construction here peaked in 1920 and declined as the result of the economic depression at the end of the decade. The exclusive area was the home of many prominent Fort Worth oilmen and business leaders. Detailing of the elegant houses reflects a variety of architechtural styles popular during the early 20th century."

SAGINAW BEGINS CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

The northwest Tarrant County city of Saginaw began its Centennial celebration festivities in early September with a musical program, cow-chip throwing contest, mechanical armadillo races, pancake breakfast, chili cook-off, and bridge tournament. HISTORICAL COMMISSION RESEARCHERS BEGIN UNRAVELLING CENTURY-OLD KIDNAP TALE

In April 1867 a band of Kiowa warriors descended on a dog-trot cabin near present-day Azle. They found a number of young people at work in the field nearby. After they had clashed briefly with them, they stormed the house where they found Mrs. Sarah Hamleton at work at her loom while she watched over some of her smaller children. When Mrs. Hamleton tried to resist the Indians, they killed her and took two of the children, Levina Myres and her step-sister, Mary Hamleton, with them as they headed back toward their reservation in Oklahoma. The children were soon separated on the wild ride back toward the Red River, and when, after several months, Levina Myres got back to her family, she told them little Mary Hamleton had been killed. Mary was very much alive, however; she grew to adulthood with the Kiowas. She later married into the tribe and had a large family. TCHC member Mike Patterson has researched the raid and prepared a marker application which is sponsored by Azle Historical Society. The story of Mary Hamleton is well known among her Kiowa relatives, and for many years they have been trying to learn the exact spot from which Mary was abducted as a child. Patterson was recently contacted by Mr. George Tah-bone-mah of Fort Worth, a Kiowa grandson of Mary Hamleton. During his conversation with TCHC members, it was discovered that the daughter of Mary Hamleton still lives in Oklahoma. She is Mrs. Willimena Kodoseet, and is now about eighty-eight years old. TCHC hopes to plan a marker dedication early next year in which both Mary Hamleton's Anglo and Kiowa relatives may have a reunion which will have been 115 years in coming.

ARCHEOLOGICAL STUDY OF NORTHEAST TARRANT COUNTY NETS RESULTS

Dan Prikryl, a graduate student at University of Texas at Austin, has continued his studies of archeological sites along Big Bear and Little Bear Creeks in northeast Tarrant County. With help from the Tarrant County Archeological Society and the Tarrant County Historical Commission, Prikryl has examined over twenty prehistoric Indian sites in the area, and has recovered numerous artifacts, some of which are several thousand years old. A public meeting held in Grapevine on July 15 to acquaint the public with the project was well attended. Dan is now back in fall semester classes, but he will return to Tarrant County before Christmas to continue his survey. Another public meeting is being planned, possibly in the Keller area, at that time.

The church's major anniversary event is scheduled for this New Year's Eve, when an official Texas Historical Marker will be dedicated.

CHIVERS CEMETERY IN SOUTHLAKE RECEIVES HISTORICAL MARKER

On Saturday, August 7, the Texas Historical Marker for Chivers Cemetery in Southlake was dedicated. The marker was sponsored by the Make America Better Committee of the Women's Council of Realtors of the Northeast Tarrant County Board of Realtors. Representatives of the Women's Council, members of area historical organizations, and Chivers descendants were present. The marker inscription reads: "This Cemetery was established for the family of Absalom H. Chivers, a prosperous farmer and stockman who came here from Mississippi about 1851. With the help of his five slaves, he operated a farm along Dove Creek until his death in 1856. Chivers' grave is thought to be the first in this burial ground, located on his original homestead. The land was set aside as a family cemetery in 1889 by his widow Eleanor (Joyce) Chivers (1816-1896), whose grave is believed to be the last placed here. Native sandstone cairns reflect some of the pioneer burial customs."

REMEMBERING THE OLD COUNTY COURT HOUSE

To nearly everyone living in Tarrant County in the early 1890's, the County's new Court House was a topic of conversation. Many of the settlers here, accustomed to smaller, less pretentious courthouses, were overawed as the granite walls rose in Ft. Worth. TCHC member Mike Patterson's grandmother, Bessie Cavender, was a toddler at the time, but she vividly remembered an event which took place during the court house construction. On a trip to town with her grandfather, Joseph Cavender, the two went to watch the workmen, and as old man Cavender looked on skeptically he shook his head. Picking up his granddaughter and setting her on one of the building stones, he told someone near him, "This baby will be an old women before they ever get this courthouse paid for."

The original costs of construction for the courthouse were about $450,000.

THEATRE PORTRAYS FORT WORTH'S HISTORY

Fort Worth's Hip Pocket Theatre will feature performances of "Cowtown," a musical journey through Ft. Worth's history, until Nov. 4. The performances are in the White Elephant Beer Garden. "Cowtown" was the group's inaugural show five years ago, and is being revived with the help of grants from the Meadows Foundation of Dallas and the local Performing Arts Grant Program. The work, by Johnny Simons and Douglas Balentine, traces the city's past from 1849 to the present. Fort Worth actor Richard Harris, playing Marshal Jim Courtright, will narrate the action and introduce characters in Ft. Worth's past such as J. Frank Norris, K.M. VanZandt, Henry Daggett, John Peter Smith, and Archibald F. Leonard.

NORTH SIDE'S MITCHELL CEMETERY RESEARCH CONTINUING

TCHC members are still gathering information on Fort Worth's first pioneer burial ground, Mitchell Cemetery, which was established near the present stockyards in 1848. In July TCHC members Duane Gage and Mike Patterson took custody of the single surviving gravestone from the cemetery. The stone was removed for safekeeping several years ago by an employee of the Ft. Worth Grain Exchange, Mr. Harley Hampton, Sr., who became alarmed when the surviving stones were damaged by machinery operating in the area. The limestone slab appears to be one-half of the capstone of a burial cairn, a type of gravemarker used here about the time of the Civil War, and marked the grave of Mrs. E.O. Anderson (1845-1867). A recent newspaper article has helped TCHC locate several descendants of pioneers buried there.

TEXAS HISTORICAL COMMISSION PUBLISHES SUPPLEMENT TO STATE MARKER GUIDE

A supplement to the 1975 edition of the Guide to Official Texas Historical Markers has been prepared by the Texas Historical Commission, and is now on sale from the THC Research Department, P.O. Box 12276, Austin, Texas 78711. The updated list contains information on approximately 1500 new markers placed in the state since 1975. The THC Research Department plans to publish a single-volume, comprehensive guide in the future. The new work will contain more information on each marker than either the present Guide or Supplement. Copies of either of the present publications may be obtained for $1.25 (plus .06 tax) each from THC. All checks should be made payable to the Texas Historical Commission.

HOOD CEMETERY IN SOUTHLAKE RECEIVES HISTORICAL MARKER

Southlake's pioneer Hood Cemetery became a Texas Historic Site on Auguest 21. The ceremony was attended by several TCHC members and descendants of the pioneers buried there. The marker inscription reads: "This cemetery was established on the farm of Peters Colonist Thomas M. Hood (ca. 1823-1859), who came to Texas from Missouri about 1845. The earliest marked grave is that of Urias Martin (1795-1855). Among the unmarked graves are those of Hood and his second wife Maryetta (Hall). Other Peters Colonists and several Confederate veterans are buried here. In 1871 Thomas Hood's family formally set aside the one-acre tract. Handmade native sandstone markers and burial cairns reflect the lifestyle and resourcefulness of early North Texas pioneers."

Two bus loads of representatives from the state leadership of the Heroines of Jericho and the Most Worshipful Prince Hall Grand Lodge of Texas attended the ceremony and took part in the program. The inscription on the marker reads: "Born in Kaufman County, William 'Gooseneck Bill' McDonald became active in politics in 1890. His ability to unite black and white voters led to his prominence as a leader of the 'Black and Tan' faction of the Republican Party. He remained influential, serving as a delegate to many state and national conventions, until the decline of the Republican Party in Texas in the early 1900s. Also active in Black Masonic orders, he served as State Secretary for 47 years. He moved to Ft. Worth in 1906, founded the Fraternal Bank and Trust Company, and was a prominent civic leader."

FORT WORTH HOSTS 1982 TEXAS HERITAGE CONFERENCE

On September 10 and 11, 1982, the Sixth Annual Texas Heritage Conference was held in Fort Worth's Hyatt Regency Hotel. The event was sponsored by the Texas Heritage Council, a committee of the Texas Historical Foundation. Titled "Showcasing Historic Preservation," the event featured Texas's most exciting and innovative preservation projects. The participants heard a wide variety of interesting presentations from several professionals concerning their work and dedication to historic preservation:

Robert M. Bass of Bass Brothers Enterprises spoke on the Sundance Square project, explaining that the restoration of the structures in Sundance Square was designed to draw attention to the firm's new high rise office buildings and to the Americana Hotel, and the project's cost could be justified in that it has drawn interest into that section of the CBD. . . . John Scofield of Woodbine Development discussed the restoration of Hotel Texas, pointing out that the decision to replace the wooden frame windows with bronze tinted energy-efficient windows tended to enhance the structure's historical qualities rather than detract from them, since originally the windows had been covered with bronze colored insect screens. . . . Veteran newspaper man Max Lale of Marshall pointed out that good press relations and good coverage of preservation events and issues depend upon a relationship of reliability that develops between preservation leaders and the news media. Local preservationists should develop a reputation of being helpful, accurate, reliable sources of information on historical preservation.

Green Washington Minter (1803-1887), who was instrumental in the founding and early growth of the fellowship. Despite hardships, the church became a focal point of the community which it served. It was moved here in 1967 when the original location was included within boundaries of the Dallas-Fort Worth Regional Airport." SUNDANCE SQUARE DEVELOPMENT PRESERVING FLAVOR OF FORT WORTH'S PAST

Twelve turn-of-the-century Fort Worth buildings have been saved and preserved to show future residents and visitors what Fort Worth looked like eighty years ago. Sundance Square, the two-square-block area along Houston, Main, and Commerce Streets between Second and Third Streets, is a part of City Center, a nine block development project of Bass Brothers Enterprises, Inc. Several restored buildings already house restaurants, specialty shops, and other business enterprises. Many of the restored buildings have notable histories, and the TCHC congratulates Bass Enterprises for their dedication and foresight. The significant Sid Richardson Collection of Western Art will be housed in the section. One of the buildings dates to 1880 and is believed by some to be the oldest standing structure in downtown Ft. Worth.

FORT WORTH PUBLIC SCHOOLS CELEBRATE CENTENNIAL

Centennial celebrations have begun for the Fort Worth Independent School District. 1982 marks the system's one hundredth year of operation, and this past August saw the first of many observances when several former school board members were honored at a trustees meeting. A city wide centennial celebration will be held in March, and a special week for high school graduates will be held in May. Several schools have planned anniversary parties of their own as well. The celebration will include events scheduled during the next twelve months. A history fair will be held February 28-March 4, and will spotlight items of importance in Fort Worth's school history. TCHC member Billy Sills is Centennial Celebration Chairman.

ANNUAL ORGANIZATION MEETING

Tarrant County Historical Commission's Annual Organizational Meeting is scheduled for Wednesday, January 12, 1983, in Meeting Room C, Fort Worth Central Library, 300 Taylor Street. The Commission's 1983 officers will be elected and the Planned Program of Work will be discussed.

AWARDS NOMINEES SELECTED

At its November 1982 regular meeting the Commission nominated Michael E. Patterson as the Commission's candidate for "Outstanding Committee Chairman" for his chairmanship of the highly active Cemetery Preservation Committee. Patterson spearheaded the work of several cemetery associations and researched historical marker applications for nine topics in 1982.

Marty Craddock was selected as the Commission's candidate for "Outstanding Commission Member" for her work on the county-wide historical survey of sites and structures. Marty is the Commission's representative to the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County.

The Commmission selected three publications for state competition, including Cemeteries of Northeast Tarrant County, by Evelyn D'Arcy Cushman; Eagles Must Fly, Charles Young, editor; and a regional monograph on Texas fresh water springs.

The Commission's Quarterly Newsletter will also be entered for the 1982 competition. State awards for 1982 will be announced at the 1983 Annual Historical Preservation Conference scheduled for Galveston April 14-16th.

I-30 OVERHEAD EXPRESSWAY'S FUTURE STILL UNDETERMINED

"I Care," an organization recently formed to stop the overhead expansion of Interstate 30 in downtown Fort Worth, has launched a letter-writing campaign to rally support to pressure federal and state agencies into putting the freeway below the surface. Attorney Jonathan D.F. Nelson is chairman of "I Care"(Citizen Advocates for Responsible Expansion, Inc.) Serving on its steering committee are Anne T. Bass, Susan B. Kneton, and Lon Burnam. A list of 147 individuals are serving as officers of "I Care," which is attempting to create a public awareness of its effort to stop the elevated expansion.

The new organization maintains that the overpass over Lancaster through downtown significantly threatens the Fort Worth Water Garden, encroaches upon several historical buildings, and perpetuates a traffic safety hazard. Studies indicate that a depressed throughway would cost only 7% more than the current expansion plan, and would generate an additional $2.4 million in tax benefits annually. Dallas, Seattle, Boston, New York and Omaha have received federal funds to build depressed thoroughfares.

TARRANT COUNTY CEMETERY TRUST FUND RECEIVES GRANT

Thanks to the $5,000 matching grant from the Mary Potishman Lard Trust, TCHC's dream of providing care for the county's neglected and unkept pioneer cemeteries has taken a giant step toward coming true! The Commission received donations from over forty individuals, firms, and organizations in successfully meeting the challenge. Congratulations are in order to Larry Landis, Chairman of the Finance and Budget Committee, for initiating the drive. The Commission now awaits official word from County Judge Mike Moncrief for developing plans for using proceeds from the account. Ultimately the trust fund should have more than $100,000; future fundraising efforts therefore are to be made.

1982 WAS BANNER YEAR FOR HISTORICAL MARKER PROGRAM

The Tarrant County Historical Commission's marker program has been the most active in the state, for the fourth straight year. Twenty-seven (27) official Texas Historical marker applications were submitted to the Texas Historical Commission, including seven building markers. Fifteen of the twenty-seven marker applications were researched and written by Commission members. Twenty-two new markers were installed during the year and fifteen formal marker dedication programs were conducted. Over $9,900.00 for historical markers was raised for purchasing markers.

Awaiting funding are completed applications for Ayres Cemetery, Tarrant County's 1871 Independence Day Indian Raid, Isham's Chapel, Mitchell Cemetery, and several others whose research is nearly completed. Donations for historcal markers ($325.00 each) can be made to Texas Historical Commission, mailed to TCHC, Box 18331, Fort Worth, Texas 76118.

Tarrant County Historical Commission Associate Marilyn Patterson's marker cover design for dedication programs has been ordered by several county commissions.

DISPLAY IDEAS AND ARTIFACTS ARE NEEDED FOR TARRANT COUNTY "HISTORY ROOM"

When the renovation of the Tarrant County Court House is completed in 1983, one of its attractions for visitors and residents alike will be the room set aside as a meeting and display room devoted to the rich history of Tarrant County. The Commissioners Court and TCHC members plan to provide an interesting learning experience to visitors by maintaining exhibits of artifacts, documents, and photographs dealing with county history.

If you have an interesting collection of original photographs, appropriate documents, or small artifacts and wish to donate them to the citizens of Tarrant County, please contact TCHC Chairman Duane Gage at 281-7860 or member Mrs. J. J. Ballard at 732-0396. Appropriate furnishings for the room are also needed.

"ENCYCLOPEDIA OF TARRANT COUNTY HISTORY" CONTINUES TO TAKE SHAPE

When, several months ago, the TCHC formally adopted the publication of a work on Tarrant County history as a Sesquicentennial Project, it was determined that the new work should be one of accuracy, general interest, and conciseness. With those goals in mind, work is progressing to make the new book the most readily useful of all the historical works now in print which deal with Tarrant County's colorful past. Patterned after the Handbook of Texas, TCHC member and project editor Mike Patterson stresses that he wishes to perpetuate the good points of all the histories now in circulation while trying to clarify some of those same histories' inaccuracies and ambiguities. A large number of articles have already been completed, and several persons with expertise in specialized areas of county history have agreed to make contributions.

FROM THE "ENCYCLOPEDIA OF TARRANT COUNTY HISTORY" IN PROGRESS

THE 1865 INDIAN RAID ON INDIAN CREEK. In September 1865 a small raiding party of southern plains warriors entered Wise County and, on September 14, attacked a lone rider, Alonzo Dill. Mr. Dill made his escape, and within a few minutes the same raiders overtook, killed, and scalped Rev. Jacob Moffett, a circuit-riding minister who lived near present-day Newark. After killing Moffett, the band entered Tarrant County and encountered two Denton County residents, Mr. Smith and Mr. Wright, as they rode along Indian Creek, a tributary of the West Fork of the Trinity River a few miles northeast of present-day Azle. The encounter took place on the James Young farm, a short distance north of where FM 1220 crosses Indian Creek today. Smith and Wright were returning home from a horse race in either Parker or Palo Pinto Counties. Smith was riding a mule, and was armed with a shotgun and a six-shooter. Wright was riding a race horse but was unarmed. When attacked, Wright tried to escape but was later found dead. Smith retreated to the cover of timber along the West Fork, and successfully stood off his attackers. He was shot in the nose by an arrow, however, and had to ride to Denton before it could be removed. Taking a large horse herd they had gathered, the Indians passed out of the area through Denton County.

TCHC RESEARCHER IN SOUTHWEST TARRANT COUNTY UNCOVERS MAJOR HISTORICAL SOURCE

Southwest Tarrant County researcher Alta Lee Futch, working in conjunction with Richard Lowe of the U. S. Army Corps of Engineers, has compiled a major list of abandoned and forgotten pioneer cemeteries in southwest Tarrant County. The Corps has agreed to share their information with the TCHC on the several cemeteries which came under the jurisdiction of the Government at the time the Benbrook Reservoir Project began. The cemeteries include the Rushing Cemetery (moved to Burleson Cemetery in October 1948); the Hunter Cemetery (moved to Benbrook Cemetery in 1950); the Day Cemetery (moved to Benbrook Cemetery); the Muhlinghause Cemetery (moved to Benbrook Cemetery); the Mustang Cemetery (moved to Benbrook Cemetery), and the January Cemetery (moved to Benbrook Cemetery).

With the wealth of interest in adaptive reuse and preservation of historic structures in Texas today, and with the always-present interest in local history nearly everyone shares, it is important that everyone in Texas should keep in touch with the "Spokesman for Historic Preservation in Texas," the Texas Historical Commission's monthly publication called The Medallion. For an annual subscription fee of $5, readers are kept abreast of statewide preservation efforts, recent legislation that affects historical endeavors, exciting projects going on throughout Texas, upcoming events, and many other topics of general interest to County Commission members and the general public as well. FORT WORTH'S STAR TELEGRAM STIRS UP HISTORICAL INTEREST IN THOUSANDS

When the Fort Worth Star-Telegram conceived the idea of a "time trivia" contest of questions about Tarrant County history, it had no idea that it would spawn the kind of widespread interest and participation it finally did. When the contest deadline arrived more than 120,000 eager Star-Telegram readers had submitted entries which answered all the newspaper's questions. Some entries even came from as far away as New Jersey and Montana. The culmination of the project, and the published answers to all the questions, came in a special issue of the newspaper called "The Rest is History," published December 7. TCHC members Duane Gage, Ruby Schmidt, and Dee Barker, consulted with the Star-Telegram when the contest was being conducted. Many invaluable benefits were realized by the community. Thousands of Tarrant County's citizens now have a deeper interest in local history, an appreciation of the time and effort needed to do historical research, and a realization that some aspects of history have been so often repeated and retold that the truth of the matter may have been lost or forgotten entirely.

Realizing that the public would want to preserve extra copies of the history supplement printed on December 7, the Star-Telegram printed a large number of extra copies for distribution to citizens and educational institutions. They also make excellent gifts for those in your family who are interested in local history. Extra copies are available for 50¢ each at the Star-Telegram Information Desk. They may also be ordered by mail from HISTORY, Fort Worth Star-Telegram, Box 1870, Ft. Worth, Texas, 76101. Postage must be included with your order.

All proceeds from the sale of the special section will be donated to the Tarrant County Historical Commission! TCHC wishes to thank the staff of the Star-Telegram for their generous support, interest, and help in all the TCHC's historical projects during 1982!

CARTER MUSEUM'S PHOTOGRAPHS ARE TOPIC OF MAJOR WORK ON HISTORY OF PHOTOGRAPHY

An important new work, Masterworks of American Photography, has been compiled by two members of the Museum staff, Marni Sandweiss and TCHC member Carol Roark. Drawing upon the resources of the Carter's vast photographic collections (more than 200,000 items), the two have put together a selection of 155 photos which captures "something of the past that is important to both art and history." Several treasures came to light during the extensive "straighten-up" job on the collection which was performed before the photos for this book were selected. One such surprise was a heretofore unknown shot of President James Knox Polk made in 1849, and a playfully-posed photo of Jesse James poking fun at himself. Sandweiss prepared several essays concerning photographic history to interpret the photos, and Roark added notes and commentary to place the selected works in a chronological sequence. The book is printed by Oxmoor House and is priced at $49.95. Ms. Sandweiss is curator of photography at the Amon Carter Museum.

CHURCH LIBRARY ACQUIRES IMPORTANT HISTORICAL SOURCE

The library of the Richland Hills Church of Christ at Rufe Snow Drive and Loop 820 in Richland Hills has recently acquired a complete set of bound reprints of The Millennial Harbinger, an important religious periodical published 1830-1870. Included with the set is a comprehensive index volume which covers the entire forty years of issues. These volumes will be especially helpful in researching the history of early Tarrant County congregations of the church of Christ and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ).

WORK OF NORTHEAST TARRANT RESEARCHER CONTINUES TO BE OF GREAT VALUE

Cemeteries of Northeast Tarrant County, Texas, by Evelyn D'Arcy Cushman, continues to be one of the most valuable research tools published to date concerning Tarrant County history. It contains a complete transcript of all readable inscriptions from more than forty pioneer cemeteries located in the northeast one-quarter of Tarrant County. Also included is invaluable information from several "lost" cemeteries which have been completely obliterated. The book is available from Mrs. Cushman at 4904 Wedgeview Dr. in Hurst, 76053.

STATE CONFEDERATE PENSION RECORDS ARE OFTEN-OVERLOOKED SOURCE

Confederate veterans who lived in Texas after the War were entitled to pensions from the State, provided certain conditions were met pertaining to their service. Soldiers who served in Texas organizations and those of other states as well, and their widows, were eligible to apply as long as they satisfied Texas residency requirements. More than sixty-five thousand applications were filed, and they are now readily usable because of the preparation of the Index to Applications for Texas Confederate Pensions, available from the Archives Division of the State Library in Austin. Important information may be obtained from the applications such as birth places and dates, marriage places and dates, data concerning Confederate service, migration dates and places, and death dates and places. The Index volume may be purchased for a small price and kept on hand for future research purposes.

FROM THE "ENCYCLOPEDIA OF TARRANT COUNTY HISTORY" IN PROGRESS

SPRING GARDEN CHURCH OF CHRIST. Spring Garden Church of Christ was founded in present-day Colleyville in the Spring Garden Schoolhouse in late 1865. Included among its charter members were Mr. and Mrs. S. C. H. Witten and three of their daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Milton Moore, Bro. and Mrs. Frogg, Mr. and Mrs. D. S. Harris, and Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Kinsley. Several prominent preachers of the day held services there, including Bro. Terrell Jasper, Gabe Elbring, Dr. Pendleton Cheek, and Cadwell W. Raines. The congregation suffered a setback when the Spring Garden Schoolhouse burned in 1872, and was entirely disbanded by 1874 when a successor congregation, New Hope Church of Christ (now known as Bedford Church of Christ), was founded about one and one-half miles to the south beside a community graveyard now known as Bedford Cemetery. Some members of the church who lived north of the Spring Garden site began meeting with the Grapevine church or began holding meetings in the Pleasant Glade Community, a short distance to the northeast.

TCHC SEEKS TO DOCUMENT TARRANT COUNTY'S INDIAN RAIDS

The TCHC has undertaken to erect official historical markers at each Indian raid site within present Tarrant County. To date three marker applications have been completed; the 1867 Kiowa Raid on Walnut Creek in present-day Azle, the 1865 raid on northwest Tarrant County's Indian Creek in which one Denton County citizen was killed, and the July 4, 1869 raid on the outskirts of northwest Ft. Worth. Other Indian raids for which TCHC researchers are presently seeking primary source records are the Comanche raid on Ft. Worth led by Chief Jim Ned and the 1871 raid which occurred in the Marine Creek section of Ft. Worth. Any persons with knowledge of these or other verifiable Indian actions within present Tarrant County are asked to contact TCHC member Mike Patterson at 283-2658.

JUNIOR HIGH STUDENTS HEAR KIOWAS RECOUNT THEIR OWN HISTORY AND CULTURE

About one hundred Texas History students and their parents from Smithfield Junior High School listened to a 90-minute presentation on October 18 at the school, presented by George and Marjorie Tah-bone, two Kiowa members of Ft. Worth's Indian community. They brought nearly fifty authentic Kiowa items which had been in their families for generations; some of the artifacts were made and used in pre-reservation days. Mrs. Tah-bone is related to Two Hatchet and Gotebo. Mr. Tah-bone is the grandson of Mary Hamleton (Indian name To-goam), an Anglo girl taken into captivity in 1867 when her family's home along Walnut Creek (in present-day Azle) was raided by a band of Kiowas led by one of Mrs. Tah-bone's ancestors, Satanta. The program was arranged and coordinated by TCHC member Mike Patterson.

MITCHELL CEMETERY RESEARCH CONCLUDED

The oldest Anglo-American cemetery in Fort Worth, the Mitchell Cemetery, will get the historical marker and the recognition it has been deserving for so many years. TCHC researchers recently compiled a marker application to honor the 134-year-old cemetery which lies nearly forgotten near the intersection of Northeast 28th Street and Decatur Avenue. It was begun in July 1848 with the burial of a son of John B. York, later a Tarrant County sheriff and victim of one of the county's few shoot-outs. York himself was buried in the cemetery in 1861, and six years later his father-in-law, Seaborne Gilmore, was buried nearby as well. Gilmore was the first elected Tarrant County Judge. TCHC researchers have pieced together as many facts as possible concerning the cemetery plot's history of ownership and the lives of those known to be buried in it. In early December, a gravestone was secured to mark the grave of Gilmore, based on his service in the Mexican War. As renovation efforts proceed at the cemetery pending the arrival of the marker, the TCHC would like to encourage descendants of the other pioneers there to erect monuments within the cemetery to memorialize the others buried within it.

TCHC NEWSLETTER GETS OFFICIAL PAT-ON-THE-BACK

In late October Duane Gage, TCHC Chairman, received the following letter: "We process over 200 pieces of mail every working day, but I always take time to look through the Tarrant County Historical Commission News. It is filled with interesting and well written preservation articles from the Fort Worth region. Keep up the good work! Sincerely, Curtis Tunnell, Executive Director, [Texas Historical Commission]."

TCHC MEMBER SEEKS COPIES OF OLD VOLUMES

TCHC member Mike Patterson would like to buy a copy of the two volume work by Joseph C. McConnell entitled The West Texas Frontier, printed in 1939 in Palo Pinto by the Texas Legal Bank and Book Company. Patterson may be contacted at 283-2658.

From November 20 to January 30, 1983, Ft. Worth's Kimbell Museum will host "Mauritshuis: Dutch Painting of the Golden Age from the Royal Picture Gallery, the Hague." This traveling exhibition of works by Rembrandt, Johannes Vermeer, Frans Hals, Jacob van Ruisdael, Jan Steen, and others will be accompanied by lectures delivered by an international team of experts on Dutch art. The exhibition was set to appear in Washington D.C., Ft. Worth, Chicago, and Los Angeles, and was timed to coincide with the 200th anniversary of the opening of formal diplomatic relations between the United States and the Netherlands. The forty paintings include portraits, still lifes, landscapes, maritime scenes, cityscapes, religious themes, and depictions of ordinary events.

HURST-EULESS-BEDFORD ISD NAMES NEW ELEMENTARY AFTER NEARBY PIONEER SCHOOL

In an October meeting, the leadership of the HEB Independent School District voted to name their eighteenth elementary school, now under construction, after a pioneer Tarrant County school which once stood near the site of the new building. The Spring Garden Elementary School, to be completed in time for the 1983-1984 school term, will bear the name of the Spring Garden School, a pioneer institution founded in late 1865 by area settlers S. C. H. Witten, Milton Moore, and others. The original schoolhouse, which sat within sight of the new building, was destroyed by fire in 1872 and was not rebuilt. School administrators decided upon the name after reading an application for a Texas Historical Marker for the Spring Garden Community which was prepared by TCHC member Mike Patterson. Patterson and the TCHC were honored at an October School Board meeting and at the Groundbreaking Ceremony held on November 16. Several descendants of S. C. H. Witten, the original school's founder, were present at the Groundbreaking.

HISTORICAL MARKER DEDICATED AT FT. WORTH'S ST. JOHN'S EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH

The Texas Historical Marker for St. John's Evangelical and Reformed Church was dedicated in ceremonies held at the church at 908 Pennsylvania Avenue on October 31. Several members of the TCHC were present. The marker's inscription reads: "A United Church of Christ, this congregation was chartered in October 1882 under the direction of the Rev. F. Werning, a pioneer missionary from Waco. It grew from early worship services in the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. Raab, conducted for twelve families of German descent. The church's original sanctuary was built on Calhoun Street, but was moved to the corner of Texas and Taylor Streets before being relocated here in 1915. For over a century St. John's Evangelical and Reformed Church has played an important role in the area's development."

NORTHEAST TARRANT COUNTY ARCHEOLOGICAL SURVEY UPDATE

Even though project coordinator Dan Prikryl has resumed his master's work at UT Austin, several members of the TCHC have been continuing to survey the several prehistoric Indian sites in Tarrant County. Dan has been in contact with workers here, and has asked that we continue to monitor the several sites at which work has already been done. At least one important site on Big Bear Creek has been destroyed in the past month, and workers here need to be especially watchful so that if a site is in imminent danger, at least one last surface collection of artifacts from the site can be made. Dan plans to return to Tarrant County in February to complete the survey work, and to finish gathering data for his master's thesis on Northeast Tarrant Archeology.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR STATE AND LOCAL HISTORY INCREASES DUES

The Nashville, Tennessee based American Association for State and Local History has increased its membership dues, effective October 1. Local history researchers and others in related fields who are unfamiliar with the organization may obtain membership and benefits information from the AASLH, 708 Berry Road, Nashville, Tennessee 37204. AASLH has been a leader for many years in the publication of practical, dependable, and applicable materials for local historical and preservation groups. Each month's issue of History News, the official publication, contains one technical leaflet. These leaflets are specific and detailed treatments of topics such as archival photography, textile preservation strategies, museum cataloging systems, etc., most of which can be found nowhere else. Each leaflet contains an excellent bibliography. The Association also publishes and distributes a large number of books dealing with methods of research and preservation.

Russell and Frederic Remington, went on public display on November 23 when the Sid Richardson Gallery opened on Ft. Worth's Sundance Square. The gallery will be open from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Tuesday through Friday, and from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday. STOCKYARDS HOTEL, 1907 NORTHSIDE LANDMARK, IS OBJECT OF $2,000,000 EFFORT

Stockyards pioneer T. M. Thannisch's dreams will be reborn in late 1983 when the "new" Stockyards Hotel, under the direction of owners Marshall Young and Tom Yater, will open its doors. Young and Yater recently purchased the three-story brick building which was built in 1907 to replace the earlier 1897 hotel of the same name. The two Fort Worth businessmen are as proud of their hotel as was Mr. Thannisch, and they are taking pains to see that should he come back today, he would not feel out of place. Since buying the property on Ft. Worth's Northside, they have gone to work to learn as much as they can about the building's history, architecture, and potential. They are seeking a Texas Historical Marker, and plan to be doubly careful with the upcoming restoration so that it will comply with the Texas Historical Commission's rigid guidelines.

LONGTIME FRIEND AND SUPPORTER OF LOCAL HISTORY RESEARCH PASSES AWAY IN AZLE

One of the most important and dedicated supporters of local historical research in Tarrant County, Mrs. Blanche Dameron Scrimshire, passed away on December 16 in Azle. She was 92. Born in Azle in 1890, she was the daughter of Dr. J. W. Dameron, a pioneer traveling physician well known in North Texas. Her active involvement in historical writing and research spanned many years, and her memories of oral traditions of the northwest Tarrant County area stretched back to the area's earliest Anglo settlement. In September, she recounted to this writer the story of her uncle's fatal encounter along the Trinity River with a band of Indians. Mrs. Scrimshire joined Azle's Ash Creek Baptist Church when she was eleven years old, attended the Azle Schools, and graduated from Mary Hardin Baylor College in Belton in 1908. She taught a Sunday School Class at Ash Creek for sixty years. She was buried in the pioneer family cemetery of her grandfather, the Hoggard-Reynolds Cemetery, near Azle.

FORT WORTH'S CARTER MUSEUM TO EXHIBIT PHOTOS OF 1940's TEXAS LIFE

In 1943, Standard Oil of New Jersey staged a massive public relations campaign designed to show Texans how their state had changed from the days of the cattle kingdom to the present. The dramatic transition of Texas was captured in a collection of 6,000 photographs. Beginning on January 21 at the Carter Museum in Ft. Worth, a selection of 114 of those photographs will make up a unique exhibition entitled "Out of the Forties: A Portrait of Texas from the Standard Oil Collection." The exhibition was conceived and put together by the staff of Texas Monthly magazine and the Carter Museum staff. Photographers Russell Lee and Esther Bubley did most of the photo work in Texas, and when they were finished it was obvious that they had much more than a work of propaganda. A symposium will be held at the Museum to complement the exhibition. Speakers will include Bubley and Lee, the photographers; James C. Anderson, archives director at the University of Louisville, Kentucky; Nicholas Lemman, Texas Monthly executive director and author of Out of the Forties, a book dealing with the photographs. There will be no admission charge for the symposium, but those interested are asked to make reservations at (817) 738-1933. Museum hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday, and 1 p.m. to 5:30 p.m. on Sunday.

KENNEDALE'S SNIDER CEMETERY RECEIVES HISTORICAL MARKER

On Thursday, December 23, TCHC members Duane Gage and Mike Patterson placed the Texas Historical Marker in Kennedale's Snider Cemetery. Located in a tract of woodland south of downtown Kennedale, the cemetery is virtually unknown to everyone except nearby residents. TCHC hopes to organize a project during 1983 to have the plot surveyed and recorded in county records. The marker inscription reads: "Born about 1805 in South Carolina, Joel Snider (d.1887) moved his family to Shelby County, Texas in the early 1840's. By 1856, they had settled on this property near present-day Kennedale. This part of the land came to be used as a cemetery by Snider's family and neighbors. The oldest readable marked grave is that of Daniel McVean (1800-1858), a stonecutter from New York. Snider was a farmer, merchant, and an active Mason. He and his wife Jeanette (Hudson) (1800-1878) are both buried here. Several other citizens of the Republic of Texas are buried in this pioneer cemetery."

TEXAS HIGHWAYS IS OVERLOOKED SOURCE OF POPULAR TEXAS LOCAL HISTORY

Don't judge a magazine by its cover or title. Texas highways are not just used by tourists looking for great food and scenery. Those same highways will take you to the thousands of historical sites located all over Texas. Texas Highways magazine is fast becoming one of the most interesting, most colorful, most read magazines in the state. As the Official Publication of the Texas Sesquicentennial, it deserves the attention of all Texans interested in their state's history. The January 1983 issue, for example, contains ten feature articles; six of those ten deal with historical preservation, adaptive reuse, or appreciation. The magazine now has 270,000 subscribers and is still growing. People from all fifty states and 140 foreign countries now regularly receive it. Subscriptions are $10 per year and may be obtained from Texas Highways, PO Box 5016, Austin, Tex. 78763.

BIRDVILLE ISD HEARS IN-SERVICE EDUCATION PROGRAM ON USING LOCAL HISTORY

On October 19 TCHC member Mike Patterson presented a two-hour inservice education program to social studies teachers entitled "Using Birdville Cemetery as a Social Studies Resource." The program was held at the cemetery, and covered such topics as cemetery folklore, the evolution of gravestone designs, biographies of prominent Tarrant Countians buried in the cemetery, folk beliefs and customs as mirrored in cemetery customs, and general local history of the Birdville Community. The twenty-five teachers attending received a TCHC-prepared handout which served as a supplement to the material presented in the tour.

TARRANT COUNTY SLAVE HISTORY IS CONTAINED IN THE SLAVE NARRATIVES OF TEXAS

As work continues on the Encyclopedia of Tarrant County History, researchers are continuing to discover Tarrant County historical materials which have been in print for many years. In a 1974 Encino Press publication, The Slave Narratives of Texas, editors Ronnie C. Tyler and Lawrence R. Murphy have included autobiographical information given by several ex-slaves who lived in Tarrant County.

William M. Adams had spent 93 years in Texas when he was interviewed. He was born in San Jacinto County. After slavery, he worked in grocery stores, punched cattle, farmed, and preached. He moved to Fort Worth in 1902. James Cape was more than 100 years old when interviewed at his home, a "dilapidated shack in the rear of the Ft. Worth Stockyards." When he was interviewed in 1937, he recalled that after his birth in southeast Texas he had spent most of his life as a cowboy. William Hamilton was living in Fort Worth when interviewed. He didn't know when or where he was born, but he vividly remembered his early life as a slave.

James Hayes, 101 years old when interviewed, was born in Shelby County, Texas. He lived "on a green slope overlooking the Trinity River" in Mosier Valley, a Negro settlement near Fort Worth. He was alert, stood erect, and was generally very active for his age, interviewers recalled. Eliza Holman was born near Clinton, Mississippi. She came to Texas in 1861 and settled in Wise County. She was interviewed in the 1930's at her home in Fort Worth. Bill Homer, 87 years old when he gave his reminiscences at his Ft. Worth home, recalled that he grew up near Shreveport, Louisiana and came to Texas in 1860.

Julia Malone was born near Lockhart, Texas, and was 79 years old when the interviewers visited her home in Ft. Worth. Louise Matthews, also a Ft. Worth resident, lived alone in her old age and was unsure of her birthplace. She thought she was raised in East Texas. Anna Miller was an 85-year-old Kentucky native who lived in Missouri before coming to Palo Pinto County, Texas. When interviewed, she was living with her daughter in Fort Worth, trying hard to live on a pension of $7 per month. Henderson Perkins came to Centerville, Texas from Nashville, Tennessee before the Civil War. He was 85 years old when he told his story at his Ft. Worth home.

Betty Powers, eighty years old, complained to visitors that her memory had been failing for the past five years before project interviewers visited her in Ft. Worth. Elsie Reece was born in Grimes County in 1847. In 1926 she moved to Ft. Worth to live with her daughter. Annie Row told interviewers who visited her in Ft. Worth that she was 86 years old and had been born on a plantation near Rusk, Texas. James W. Smith, a 77-year-old retired preacher, was a child too young to work during slavery times. He moved to Ft. Worth in 1931.

Sam Jones Washington, born in Wharton County, Texas, was 88 years old when interviewed. He worked as a cowboy until 1905 when he went to work in the Ft. Worth packing houses. In 1937 he was receiving a small pension and spent his time raising hogs and gardening. Rose Williams was born on a plantation in Bell County, Texas. She knew she was more than 90 years old when interviewed in Ft. Worth, and had been blind for more than ten years.

The interviews included in the book were collected all over Texas during the 1930's by interviewers working under the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration. The Slave Narratives of Texas is available at several area bookstores and public libraries.

NEW RESEARCH DIRECTOR NAMED FOR TEXAS HISTORICAL COMMISSION

Tarrant County Historical Commission welcomes the appointment of Dan Utley as new Director of Research for the Texas Historical Commission, succeeding Claire Williams, who has resigned to do Christian service work. Dan has been an excellent support person for our historical marker program; his ability to analyze our marker applications and draft concise inscriptions suggests that the THC's Department of Research is still in good hands. We will miss Claire Williams at the state office but wish her the best in her magnificant new endeavor.

WATAUGA HISTORICAL RESEARCH CENTER

Frank English, the unofficial president of a 10-member Watauga group, has announced a project to conduct field research on "Negro Cemetery Road (now called old Denton Highway)." The group uses metal detectors, tape recorders, video recorders and cameras to record oral interviews with older citizens, find long forgotten places and generally trace the origins of Northeast Tarrant County.

LARRY BANKS, CORPS OF ENGINEERS ARCHEOLOGIST, ADDRESSES SCHOOL GROUP

Hurst resident Larry Banks, District Archeologist for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, addressed a large school group at Colleyville Middle School on Oct. 13th. Using slides, Banks impressed students with stories of prehistoric mammals and reptiles which one lived in present Colleyville, and gave his listeners several details about prehistoric Indian sites located just a few miles from the school. The Tarrant County Historical Commission wishes to thank Larry Banks and his family for their warm support of both Commission activities and other projects of area historical and archeological groups.

REGIONAL CONFERENCE ON WOMEN'S HISTORY PLANNED AT TWU

On April 14-16, at Texas Women's University the Organization of American Historians will sponsor a regional conference on integrating women's history into college survey courses. The program will feature outstanding nationally-known speakers, displays of material culture artifacts, slide presentations, and a book exhibit. For information contact Martha H. Swain, Conference Coordinator, TWU, P O Box 23974, Denton Texas 76204 (817)566-1372.

LAND TITLE ABSTRACT PROJECT

The large volume of land title abstracts that are being researched by Mildred Spratling and Elizabeth Schuber have been sorted and are now being listed, culled, and arranged for further research purposes. A second large collection of abstracts, from the U.S. Life Title Company, has been received by the Commission, including probate records and documents that, in some cases, predate the 1876 Tarrant County Courthouse fire. Eventually these records will be arranged into retreivable form, providing valuable research data to the early land transactions and family histories of Tarrant County citizens before the turn of the century.

ARCHIVES COMMITTEE ACTIVITIES

Committee Chairman Ruby Schmidt continues to be a major source for news writers, educators, students, and genealogists who seek sources on Tarrant County material. She has coordinated a photographic inventory project for the Texas Historical Foundation and has sorted Tarrant County materials from the Footprints publication of the Fort Worth Genealogical Society. She has also spearheaded a project to prepare slide presentations on Fort Worth history and has led several historical tours of Fort Worth's historical sites and structures.

FORT WORTH'S BROADWAY BAPTIST CHURCH CENTENNIAL HISTORY MARKED

On the evening of its one hundredth anniversary of existence, Fort Worth's Broadway Baptist Church celebrated its centennial and dedicated an official Texas Historical marker. . Its inscription:

"On December 31, 1882, six men and three women met to organize this congregation. They called the Rev. John Smith Gillespie as their first Pastor. The name South Side Baptist Church was adopted January 14, 1883, at worship services held in a rented hall at 15th and Houston Street.

In 1886 the fellowship erected a frame church building on the southwest corner of Broadway and St. Louis Avenue. Four years later the congregational name was changed to Broadway Baptist Church.

As the church grew, larger facilities were needed. In 1906 a brick structure replaced the original building. On April 3, 1909, a devastating fire swept Fort Worth's South Side, destroying over 200 structures, including the church building, parsonage, and the homes of 22 member families. Rebuilding started immediately, and a new church structure was completed in 1910.

The Church complex expanded with the addition of educational facilities. A new sanctuary was begun in 1949 and completed by Easter Sunday in 1952.

The membership of Broadway Baptist Church has grown to over 2,500 in its centennial year. At least seven other Baptist churches have been established through the efforts of this congregation."

Climb on a flat-bed wagon drawn by two chesty Belgian steeds for the ride through the gully and across Walnut Creek, and you've gone back 100 years in time as sure as you're born.

And that's just the way Charlie McCafferty likes it.

McCafferty and four 'bidness' partners, as he likes to put it, are giving Yankees — and natives — a taste of old-time Texas through their newly-formed company, Texas Yesteryears. Hayrides, barbecue served chuckwagon style, crackling campfires, cowboy songs, stars over the lonesome trail, trigger-happy gunfighters — the works.

"You could say this was started catch as catch can and it just picked up from there," McCafferty says, hooking his thumbs into the pockets of his jeans. "You see, the entire concept is to maintain within the limits of reason the authentic Texana." Laughing. "We're still in the middle of a city if you want to get technical, but we try to make it as much like what it was before there was any plastic."

This particular weekend McCafferty has hauled 72 band students from Illinois out to the "ranch" for a chuckwagon dinner and songs around the campfire. The kids, on a spring break performance tour, are dressed for the occasion in boots and blue jeans. A few have even managed to get the "ya'll" halfway decent — though most sound like yawning cats.

McCafferty is having even more fun than the kids as he hustles them off to the hay wagons and bridles the horses to his surrey for the half-mile ride down to the campsite.

"Yes, ma'am, when these little horses get out in the country, they get so excited. It's the freedom of the open. I guess I'm the same way," McCafferty says, stroking the pony's mane. "The other day I just let 'em go. I'm not the skittish type, but they really put butterflies in my belly."

For several years McCafferty, who founded the North Fort Worth Historical Society, has been a one-man tourist agency for the North Side, conducting expeditions through the Stockyards, up and down Exchange Avenue. Now he and his partners have made the tourism business official with Texas Yesteryears. They offer everything from pony rides for birthday parties to hayrides for local church groups to chuckwagon barbecues for 400 people and more.

"It all just kind of evolved," McCafferty says, grinning. "Shoot, it's something we like to do."

It's a full-time business, but all the partners except Lawrence Ricker work at it part-time. Ricker, who sold his Benbrook Stables last year, is the general manager and provides the horses. McCafferty is a fireman in the real world; Carl Butts is a an accountant with a local bank; Winston Sparks, an engineer with General Dynamics; John Hernandez, a print company salesman.

For McCafferty, 50, a third-generation Fort Worthian, telling about West Texas comes as natural as breathing. One grandfather came to Fort Worth in 1872 as chief weighmaster at the Fort Worth Stockyards Co.; and another drove the stagecoach between Fort Worth and Weatherford. His mother was born in 1903 in Tent City, a makeshift collection of canvas homes at Marine Creek Road and N.E. 21st Street. His father, too, was chief weighmaster of the Stockyards Company in his day.

As for McCafferty, with his barrel chest, drooping mustache and close-shaved hair, he breathes Texas lore.

"All of us were just born 100 years too late," explains Dan Padgett, a service engineer Monday through Friday and a quick-shooting marshal on the weekends.

One of the gunfighters hired for the occassion, Padgett reeks of authenticity in his knee-length frock coat, black string tie, and round-toed boots. His rawhide holster is a replica of the kind lawmen used to wear and his single-action revolver is older than this century. He's standing around the campfire, rubbing the barrel of his gun until it shines.

"It was a period of time when a certian type of man that will never be again lived. He was hard, caloused, had no fear — absolutely void of fear. They would have had to be that way to do the things they did," says Padgett. "Take Jim Courtright — he built quite a reputation 'til Luke Short shot him here in Fort Worth."

Padgett is an avowed history buff, living the legends he tells. His role in the gunfight staged for the group lasts only a minute or two, but he's willing to spin yarns of western adventure long into the night.

The gunfight is an optional extra in the chuckwagon dinner package, but it adds a nice touch to the night, and occasionally catches a few guests off guard. Guests are free to put their own packages together, adding a gunfighter, a western singer or horseback rides before dinner.

The real fantasy, though, takes life when the sun sets and McCafferty hangs lanterns from the live oak trees. Then in the soft glow from the campfire, Steve Mitchell tunes up his fiddle or his guitar — whichever strikes his fancy — and begins to croon the old trail songs.

Mitchell, a round-faced replica of a young Gene Autry, performs regularly around the area. He and Butts, who plays the accordion, have cut an album to be released soon. There's a little square dancing and a lot of singing along to Red River Valley, You Are My Sunshine and Darlin' Clementine.

It's a family affair, nostalgic and relaxing with plenty of time for roaming through the pasture before supper or counting the constellations. By the end of May, McCafferty expects to have six different outings on the books scheduled for out-of-towners and locals. He's quick to point out that Texas Yesteryears can accommodate almost any request.

Texas Yesteryear's fees range from $2 a person for the daily tours and rides in the Stockyards to $455 a day to rent a 12 passenger stagecoach and draft horses. A ranch breakfast — eggs scrambled over a campfire at sunrise — runs $8 per person and the chuckwagon barbecue outing is $15 a person for groups of 50 to 399 people or $14 a person for groups of 400 or more. By DEBBIE MITCHELL
Star-Telegram Writer

In the burnt-orange of the sun's last rays, a burly stranger rides through the mesquite trees into camp. He's a mean-looking hombre, a crushed felt hat pulled low on his brow, a Sharps rifle slung from his saddle.

"Can you spare a tired rider a cup of coffee?" he asks, then spotting the man who has made camp, he laughs. "Ah, it's you, marshal. I might have known."

"Give up, Luke. Me and my deputies have you surrounded. Now just hand down your gun. Your killing days are done."

"You're too much of a match for me, marshal," says Luke, reaching to slip the rope from his shotgun. With a scarcely perceptible twist and flex, both barrels of the Sharps are pointed square at the marshal's black vest. "You're a dead man now, marshal.

But the marshal is quicker still. His Colt .45 spits fire and Luke crumples to the ground.

Just at that moment, somewhere on a nearby highway an unseen ambulance wails and the group around the campfire begins to laugh. Luke sits up and winks at the marshal. "Civilization to the rescue," someone jokes.

Well almost. Despite its proximity to four lanes of asphalt and the neon of a Dairy Queen sign, the 250-acre tract in southwest Tarrant County could be miles from the nearest electric light. Sure, from the hilltop you can see power lines, a McDonald's and an Exxon filling station, but down in the draw, sounds of the 20th century are muffled by the wind whispering through the mesquites. Horses run free through a sun-kissed clearing and blue bonnets stretch knee-deep as far as you can see.

church groups to chuckwagon barbecues for 400 people and more.

"It all just kind of evolved," McCafferty says, grinning. "Shoot, it's something we like to do."

It's a full-time business, but all the partners except Lawrence Ricker work at it part-time. Ricker, who sold his Benbrook Stables last year, is the general manager and provides the horses. McCafferty is a fireman in the real world; Carl Butts is a an accountant with a local bank; Winston Sparks, an engineer with General Dynamics; John Hernandez, a print company salesman.

For McCafferty, 50, a third-generation Fort Worthian, telling about West Texas comes as natural as breathing. One grandfather came to Fort Worth in 1872 as chief weighmaster at the Fort Worth Stockyards Co., and another drove the stagecoach between Fort Worth and Weatherford. His mother was born in 1903 in Tent City, a makeshift collection of canvas homes at Marine Creek Road and N.E. 21st Street. His father, too, was chief weighmaster of the Stockyards Company in his day.

As for McCafferty, with his barrel chest, drooping mustache and close-shaved hair, he breathes Texas lore.

"All of us were just born 100 years too late," explains Dan Padgett, a service engineer Monday through Friday and a quick-shooting marshal on the weekends.

One of the gunfighters hired for the occassion, Padgett reeks of authenticity in his knee-length frock coat, black string tie, and round-toed boots. His rawhide holster is a replica of the kind lawmen used to wear and his single-action revolver is older than this century. He's standing around the campfire, rubbing the barrel of his gun until it shines.

"It was a period of time when a certian type of man that will never be again lived. He was hard, calloused, had no fear — absolutely void of fear. They would have had to be that way to do the things they did," says Padgett. "Take Jim Courtright — he built quite a reputation 'til Luke Short shot him here in Fort Worth."

Padgett is an avowed history buff, living the legends he tells. His role in the gunfight staged for the group lasts only a minute or two, but he's willing to spin yarns of western adventure long into the night.

The gunfight is an optional extra in the chuckwagon dinner package, but it adds a nice touch to the night, and occasionally catches a few guests off guard. Guests are free to put their own packages together, adding a gunfighter, a western singer or horseback rides before dinner.

The real fantasy, though, takes life when the sun sets and McCafferty hangs lanterns from the live oak trees. Then in the soft glow from the campfire, Steve Mitchell tunes up his fiddle or his guitar — whichever strikes his fancy — and begins to croon the old trail songs.

Mitchell, a round-faced replica of a young Gene Autry, performs regularly around the area. He and Butts, who plays the accordion, have cut an album to be released soon. There's a little square dancing and a lot of singing along to Red River Valley, You Are My Sunshine and Darlin' Clementine.

It's a family affair, nostalgic and relaxing with plenty of time for roaming through the pasture before supper or counting the constellations. By the end of May, McCafferty expects to have six different outings on the books scheduled for out-of-towners and locals. He's quick to point out that Texas Yesteryears can accommodate almost any request.

Texas Yesteryear's fees range from $2 a person for the daily tours and rides in the Stockyards to $455 a day to rent a 12 passenger stagecoach and draft horses. A ranch breakfast — eggs scrambled over a campfire at sunrise — runs $8 per person and the chuckwagon barbecue outing is $15 a person for groups of 50 to 399 people or $14 a person for groups of 400 or more. Historical Foundation compiling guide book

AUSTIN — An unprecedented publication, "Touring Texas History — A Guide to Eateries, Hotels and Theaters in Historic Structures," is being complied to bring alive Texas' past.

This free listing of historic buildings that house places to dine, sleep and enjoy theatrical entertainment, is designed to aid travelers who want to capture the mood and flavor of Texas' multi-ethnic heritage, according to a Texas Historical Foundation press release.

Users of the guide can stop at restored stagecoach inns for a sample of frontier room and board, enjoy the elegance of Southern hospitality in East Texas' authentic Antebellum hotels and dine in buildings where history has been made.

Establishments qualifying for the guide must be in structures at least 50 years old or have an official state or national historic landmark designation.

According to touring chairman Mrs. Sherwood Inkley of San Antonio, "Our publication will cover every area of the state, from eateries in West Texas ranch houses and oil boom shacks, to establishments that are regional attractions offering local specialities and color. Visitors will be able to locate entertainment in opera houses built to host vaudeville troups at the turn-of-the-century.

"It is exciting to realize that we can sleep, eat and be entertained under the same roofs that accommodated our forebearers, many of them famous Texas leaders. The culture of our ancestors has been preserved in their buildings that are still standing for us to enjoy," she said.

The hotels, restaurants and theaters that qualify will receive a display certifying their listing in the guide, which will be distributed free to schools, bureaus, and libraries.

11:00 A.M.-2:00 P.M. - At the end of the morning session, we will have an opportunity to view the current Amon Carter Museum exhibit on 18th and 19th century religious folk art of New Mexico and to tour the nearby KIMBELL ART MUSEUM. Lunch will be on your own with suggestions to be made of eateries in the area.

2:00 P.M. - We will reassemble for a tour of the 1899 EDDLEMANN-McFARLAND HOUSE at 1110 Penn Street, recently acquired by the Junior League of Fort Worth. The house occupies a prominent site above the Trinity River near downtown and with the adjacent 1898 POLLACK-CAPPS HOUSE presents a view of the lifestyle of Fort Worth's 19th century gentry. Because of the proximity to the downtown area, we will be given an opportunity after the tour to view some of the downtown sites and structures mentioned in Duane Gage's morning presentation.

4:00 P.M. - We are invited to a reception at THISTLE HILL, the 1903 Wharton-Scott House at 1509 Pennsylvania Avenue, rescued from demolition by Texas Heritage, Inc. Since our visit coincides with a show by the Fort Worth Chrysanthemum Society, this social time will be enahnced by rooms full of flowers. After the reception participants are free to partake of the many dining opportunities in Fort Worth.

The Grapevine Sun

FIFTY YEARS AGO this group of youngsters graduated from Grapevine High School. The Class of '32 was the first to go through all 12 grades in Grapevine schools, having started in first grade. Some of them are in town this weekend for Homecoming.

GHS's first 12-year class

The Grapevine High School Class of 1931-'32 was the first to spend all 12 years in the Grapevine school system.

They graduated on May 30 at W.O.W. (Woodmen of the World) Hall, receiving their diplomas from W.M. Campbell, superintendent since the class entered first grade.

It might be news to most residents of Keller that they might just as well be living in Athol or Double Springs. In fact, that's what the community was called prior to its present name. According to a list prepared by the Tarrant County Historical Society, Keller was first known as Athol then in 1871 was renamed Double Springs. If the society knows the origin of those names it isn't saying. Keller became Keller in 1881.

The historical group is trying to round up a list of all community names in Tarrant County, and has done a pretty good job of it so far. Many of the present ciites and communities were known by other names in the beginning. For instance, Azle was once O'Bar, but it became Azle sometime prior to 1882.

were the leading contenders. However, the records of the historical society show that Deer Creek got 32 votes, Gipson's got 17, Haley was favored by 34 voters, Hatton or Hutton was the choice of 11 voters, Leonard's Mill polled 53 votes, Walnut Creek got 43, Young's received 35 and McCrackin got 12 votes.

Fort Worth won the election.

Benbrook as once known as Miranda, Everman started out as Enon and Grapevine was once known as Dunnville. Grapevine, listed by the post office in 1861, is one of the older communities which has survived. Pre-Civil War communities such as Atchidson's Point, Deer Creek, Estelle Station, Gilliland Creek, Hawkinsville Merrilltown, Robinson's Mill and Norton's Grove are all long gone and long forgotten.

They seemed to prefer more colorful names for communities back in those early years. Among those on the list are Bird's Fort, Brambleton, Calef, Fossil, Friendship, Garden of Eden, Gertie, Jellico, Liberty, Moro, Mount Gilead, Muriel, New Hope, Old Union, Rock Creek, Sweet Chapel and Spring Garden.

My favorite among the survivors is Dido, out on Eagle Mountain Lake. Like the place Phil Harris used to sing about, "It ain't no town and it ain't no city, it's awful small but it's awful pretty."

Indians ousted at Village Creek

Arlington was...

By HEIDI LAMBERT
Daily News Staff

On May 24, 1841, a relatively unknown Indian battle was fought near where Lake Arlington is today.

It was called the Battle of Village Creek.

On that day, General E. H. Tarrant, Tarrant County's namesake, led a group of 69 men to the edge of the first of three Indian villages, about a half mile south of present day Handley. They arrived just before dawn and watched as the tribe of Caddoan Indians awoke and went through their morning rituals.

The sudden attack and the unexpected thunder of gunshots cited soldiers looted the village took that first group of Indians of corn, beans and pumpkins and by surprise. took much of the Indians' ammunition.

No white man was injured in that first attack, but at least 225 Indian lodges were wiped out in about an hour. The hungry, ex-villages. About 20 men came across a large village that surrendered without incident. The third village was actually a string of villages that extended seemingly forever on both sides of Village Creek. Tarrant, realizing his men couldn't possibly take on 1,000 warriors, ordered them back to the second village.

Two of his top men volunteered to lead a small group in search of many of the Indian warriors who were on a buffalo hunt. The men followed their trail along the Trinity River bottoms and suddenly the sounds of an Indian ambush filled the wooded area. One of the leaders

Exclusive buckle out CISSY

You could say that Fort Worth Mayor Bob Bolen has the new Fort Worth belt buckle created by Haltom Industries coming and going. The first of the limited edition of 50 gold buckles was presented to Bolen by Ronald Adams, chairman of the board of Haltom Industries, in ceremonies at City Hall Wednesday morning. In addition to the gold buckles, 250 sterling silver and 1,000 bronze Fort Worth buckles will be produced — each one numbered and registered to the owner. When all of the original castings are sold, Mayor Bolen will smash the die with some 400 tons of force — mechanically assisted, of course. Our mayor is a man of some power, but 400 tons is a lot.

Landmarks detailed in the buckles include the North Side Livestock Exchange building, Tarrant County Courthouse, Will Rogers Memorial Complex and the new skyline of downtown Fort Worth. Buckles sell for $35 each for the bronze, $125 for silver and $1,950 for gold. The gold buckle also is available with two 10-point diamonds for $2,250. The Fort Worth buckle is almost guaranteed to keep strangers from saying you're from Dallas.

was shot. The rest of the men fled.

Volunteers were later sent out to recover their comrade's body. It had been pierced through each shoulder and through the chest.

About a month later, Tarrant gathered 400 men together and began an expedition once again in search of the Indians. When they arrived at the villages along Village Creek, they found the place deserted. They waited there for several days, until scouts reported that the tribes had evidently split up.

The troops began the long trip home.

History

The land of black ties and tobacco juice

Fort Worth is cattle, oil and rails; Cezanne, sculpture and Remington; dusty streets and steel skyscrapers; black ties and tobacco juice; an unruly child sprawling across the North Texas prairie and asphalt melting in the afternoon sun.

Fort Worth is as old as the cretaceous fossil on which she is built and as active as the wind that blasts her in March. She is progressive Mark IV Industrial Park and turn-of-the-century Sundance Square.

She's your home, Newcomer and Oldtimer, just as she's been the home of cattlemen and colonels, millionaires and railroad hands.

Fort Worth's origin dates back to 1849 when U.S. Army Brevet Major Ripley Allen Arnold came to defend a 200-mile frontier.

But instead of fighting Tonkawas or Comanches, Arnold imported his family and the first piano in West Texas. With that piano, he left a legacy of culture that today can be found in opera, ballet, museums and Casa Manana, the first permanent musical arena theater in America.

Arnold's Fort Worth stood between what today is the Courthouse and Cold Springs Road. When the military occupants vacated the log buildings in 1853, settlers moved in and began a struggle for county seat.

Fort Worth won the distinction as leader of Tarrant County in 1856 with a few free jugs of whiskey and a well-thrown punch or two, but her real growth came with the longhorns bound for Chicago slaughter yards.

While the rest of the South was worrying about Carpetbaggers and Republicans, Fort Worth was reveling in the post-bellum cattle boom as the last stop for flour and beans on the Chisholm Trail.

The original Fort Worth Stockyards thrived, and businessmen and cattlemen developed what has becomme one of Fort Worth's most distinctive events, the annual Southwestern Exposition and Fat Stock Show.

Cowtown lies directly north of the Courthouse, on either side of Main Street and between 23rd and 28th Streets. To tourists it is a symbol of "Where the West Began," with its Live Stock Exchange building, Cowtown Coliseum and Billy Bob's Texas, said to be the largest honkeytonk in the world. A trolley runs from downtown to the Stockyards to facilitate tourist traffic.

Although it is a tremendous tourist attraction, the North Side is still a working stockyard and the reality of the continuing frontier for its residents.

Seventy years ago livestock prices were negotiated and posted in the rambling Live Stock Exchange building. The commodities offices there still do a brisk exchange business today. The renovated Live Stock Exchange building with its high ceilings, whirring fans and plank floors now is home to art galleries and offices.

Next door to the Live Stock Exchange, the flicker of a thumb can buy a heifer from the Auction Arena. Television monitors and a microphone for the auctioneer have been added, but the dirt arena scarcely has changed in the last 60 years.

The cattle pens behind the auction arena were built in 1905 of concrete and brick for $1 million. From the catwalk above the pens, a visitor can see the Fort Worth skyline to the south and the Texas prairie to the north.

The White Elephant Saloon down Exchange Street opened in 1876 to "offer a thirsty man all he could drink" across the mahogony bar. It still serves the same purpose today with live music and dancing every evening except Sunday.

In the earlier years, Hell's Half Acre, a several-block area of saloons and houses of ill repute between 13th and 17th Streets and Jones and Main Streets was the place to carouse. In 1876 the city fathers didn't know whether to curb the wildness and lose business or to tolerate lawlessness and prosper.

Fannie Porter's house in Hell's Half Acre was headquarters for Sam Bass and his outlaw gang and the meeting place for George Leroy Parker and Harry Longbaugh, better known as "Butch Cassidy" and the "Sundance Kid." Legend reports that Cassidy actually did ride his bycycle through the unpaved Fort Worth streets.

Rusk Street, named after Gen. Thomas Jefferson Rusk, earned such a tawdry reputation that the city fathers changed its name to Commerce to avoid further embarrassing the memory of the Army hero. Commerce today runs next to the Tarrant County Convention Center and is lined with businesses.

The original boardwalks of the Stockyards have long been replaced with conglomerate, but most of the buildings have outlived their occupants. Murals on the wall of Coker's Western Store were painted for a fifth of whiskey by a cowboy down on his luck when the hat store was a saloon.

The Fort Worth Stockyards provided the community with its first economic security, but real prosperity arrived with the engines of the Texas & Pacific Railroad. When the railroad company, thwarted by the Panic of 1873, stopped laying the iron rails near Eagle Ford, Major K.M. Van Zandt and other Fort Worth leaders were forced to grade the railroad bed themselves to bring the tracks to town, but the efforts paid off.

By 1880 Fort Worth had a population of 6,663 and a downtown of sorts was growing between the Stockyards and railroad. Monnig's Department Store was built in 1889, and Stripling's opened in 1890. The courthouse was constructed in 1896 as a mini-replica of the State Capitol.

Today the domed First Christian Church, built at Sixth and Throckmorton before the Civil War, stands in the shadow of utlramodern Fort Worth National Bank. Nearby loom the First City Bank Tower and the City Center Tower II, which is still under construction. A few blocks away is the newly completed $70 million Continental Plaza, which houses the Continental National Bank. Opposite Burnett Park, the 40-story First United Tower is under construction, planned for completion by spring 1983.

These new glass and steel giants share the rapidly changing Fort Worth skyline with the twin towers of the Tandy Center.

Contrasting — and complementing — all this modernity is Sundance Square, two city blocks of restaurants and boutiques in buildings that have been restored to their original turn-of-the-century charm. Located between Second and Third along the rebricked Main Street, Sundance Square is the core of the 14-square-block City Center project which features the First City Bank Tower, the City Center Tower II and the Americana Hotel.

At the opposite end of Main Street, looking like a space ship that has just landed, is the Tarrant County Convention Center. Seating 14,680, it has been the starting place for world tours made by numerous musical groups. Next to the Convention Center, sheets of water cascade over the planes and steps of the Water Garden.

The men who developed the early downtown also built homes for themselves. Thistle Hill at 1509 Pennsylvania Ave. stands as one of the last remnants of "Quality Hill."

The massive columned mansion was built in 1903 for the daughter of cattle rich W.T. Waggoner. In 1976 the "Save the Scott Home" foundation purchased the decaying showpiece for $240,000 and began renovation work. Guided tours daily offer glimpses of Victorian elegance.

Other remaining examples of Fort Worth's "silk stocking" district are the Pollock-Capps and Eddleman-McFarlin homes which stand side by side in the 1100 block of Penn Street. The Junior League of Fort Worth has purchased and renovated the Eddleman-McFarlin House, which is open for tours on a limited basis. An architectural and interior design firm occupies the Pollock-Capps house.

Some of the aviation, cattle and oil giants of today have built their homes in the elite Westover Hills and Rivercrest additions. Westover Hills, a separate municipality, has many examples of fine contemporary architecture such as the house built by I.M. Pei, designer of the East Wing of the National Gallery in Washington, D.C., for the late Anne Windfohr Tandy.

Other elegant developments have sprung up around Fort Worth and Arlington in a dozen locations.

While the wealth of early Fort Worth came primarily from cattle and oil (which was discovered in 1917 on John McClesky's land), the economy today is fed by 120 businesses that each employ more than 250 workers. Mark IV Industrial Park, northeast of downtown, is the location for Coca-Cola Bottling Co., Georgia Pacific Corp., Volkswagen Products, W.W. Granger, Hoffman-LaRoche, Continental Can Co., Crest Containers, Sid Richardson Carbon Company Research and many other firms.

The heaviest economic impact, however, comes from the aviation industry. Amon Carter, who founded the Fort Worth Star and then bought the Telegram to form the Fort Worth Star-Telegram in 1908, introduced air travel to Fort Worth in 1911. Carter's seven daredevil pilots looped and dipped above Driving Park where the Montgomery Ward building now stands on Seventh Street.

Sixty-nine years later Fort Worth is the home of General Dynamics, which employs 16,000, and Bell Helicopter, with 900 employees. The growth of Fort Worth as a national center for the aerospace industry is closely tied with that of its air base, Carswell.

In the spring of 1940 the Chamber of Commerce and other civic groups began a movement to attract new industry, drawing the interest of the Defense Department. The War Department authorized Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp. to build a plant for manufacturing B-24 bombers — the beginning of General Dynamics, builders of the swing-wing F-111, the Strategic Air Command's B-58 and the F-16 fighter.

Carswell received its official designation as an air base in 1948 and today is the home of the 19th Air Division, the B-52 and KC-135-equipped 7th Bomb Wing and the 7th Combat support group.

Fort Worth also had a World War I military encampment. Called Camp Bowie, it was erected to house 35,000 Doughboys.

Camp Bowie Boulevard, once part of a trolley car line, ran from the military base to downtown Fort Worth. Today restaurants and shops line the brick boulevard.

Fort Worth also has a general aviation airport. Meacham Field, which logged more than 390,000 take-offs at its all-weather facilities last year, is the second busiest field in Texas, behind Dallas/Fort Worth Airport.

D/FW airport, located 24 miles from downtown Fort Worth, is one of the largest airports in the nation

Tribute to J.P. Smith

CISSY

Mrs. Edward R. Hudson returned home from a trip through Scandinavian fjords just in time to attend the Fort Worth school board session paying tribute to her grandfather, John Peter Smith, a key member of the first Municipal Board of Education and mayor of Fort Worth when the first public schools opened here in 1882. Smith and Maj. K.M. Van Zandt split the cost of the first census, which was a prerequisite before Fort Worth could receive public schools funds from the state, according to Bennett L. Smith, chairman emeritus of Tarrant County Historical Commission. Smith paid the tribute to John Peter Smith at the meeting, which officially launched the centennial year of Fort Worth Independent School District.

Dr. H. Richard O'Neal, president of the current school board, recognized contributions of early trustees and announced that the board has voted to name a living memorial — the stately oak tree growing at the east end of the administration building — in John Peter Smith's honor. Former members of the board of education from as far back as 1947 attended the meeting. Mayor Bob Bolen read a proclamation launching the Fort Worth schools' centennial year. Mrs. Hudson was accompanied by her granddaughter, Terrell Ard, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Julian Ard and a great-great-granddaughter of John Peter Smith.

The level to rolling terrain is broken by hills and drained by the West Fork and Clear Fork of the Trinity River. Timber includes mesquite, post oak, elm, and cottonwood. Soils are black waxy, loam, sandy loam, sandy clay, and sand. Chief crops are cotton, corn, hay, wheat, oats, truck, and fruit. Live-stock raising includes dairy and beef cattle, sheep, hogs, and poultry. Sand, gravel, limestone, clay, and cement materials are found in commercial quantities.

The Tarrant County area was included in Peters' County; the first settlement was made about 1840 at Bird's Fort. The region was the westernmost frontier in 1841, when General E. H. Tarrant led Texas Rangers in the battle of Village Creek and when M. T. Johnson settled at Mary Le Bone Springs to found Johnson's Station, three miles north of present Arlington. A few other families had settled in the area by 1849, when Major Ripley A. Arnold selected a site for a fort to be named for General William J. Worth.

Tarrant County, named for General E. H. Tarrant, was created from Navarro County in 1849 and organized in 1850. Birdville,, the largest settlement in the new county, was made county seat. The village of Fort Worth, which had grown up around the military establishment, had a population of about one hundred in 1853, when the 2nd Dragoons abandoned the post. The village continued to grow, however, and in 1856 the county seat was moved there from Birdville, but the election was contested and another election had to be held in 1860 for Fort Worth to win the county seat permanently.

Early transportation was furnished by stagecoach connecting with the Butterfield Overland Mail Route, Johnson's Station being a principal stop on the minor route. The arrival of the Texas and Pacific Railroad in 1876 and of the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas and the Fort Worth and Denver lines in 1881 brought speedy growth. Between 1870 and 1880 the population of the county increased from 5,788 to 22,068. The location of plants of Swift and Company and Armour and Company in 1902 increased Fort Worth's significance in the cattle industry. The discovery of oil in North Texas in 1911 brought new industries and a further increase in population. During World War I, Forth Worth was the home of the 36th Division. Three training fields, Hicks, Barron, and Carruthers, werre used to train Royal Canadian Air Force pilots and later were converted for the same use by the United States Air Force.

Fort Worth, the only large town in the county, is a railroad center, meat-packing center, and the site of other industries which make it the fourth largest city in Texas. The Santa Fe, Rock Island, and Southern Pacific Railroads have added to transportation facilities. Lake Worth and Eagle Mountain Lake furnish recreational areas and assure Fort Worth of adequate water for domestic and industrial uses. World War II brought the Marine Air Station at Eagle Mountain Lake, the Army Air Forces Training Command, Fort Worth Army Air Field (later Carswell Air Force Base), and the United States Health and Service Hospital. During World War II, Fort Worth also got its biggest boost in population and industry. Consolidated Aircraft Corporation (later Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corporation) was constructed to build B-24 bombers and later converted to B-36 bombers. Several other aircraft plants are located in the county and in the 1950's General Motors was building at Arlington a Buick-Pontiac-Oldsmobile assembly plant which can also be used for aircraft building. Population was 225,521 in 1940 and 361,253 in 1950. By 1960 the population had increased to 538,495 and in 1970 the population was 716,317, according to the United States Census.

Fort Worth, Texas. Fort Worth, on the Clear Fork of the Trinity River in central Tarrant County, grew up around the United States military post established by Major Ripley A. Arnold in 1849 and named for General William Jenkins Worth, soldier in the Mexican War. Press Farmer, who erected a tent at the river crossing in 1849, was the first merchant in the village. A. C. Coleman also opened a store later in 1849; John Peter Smith taught a school in 1853; in 1856 Lawrence Steele opened a hotel, and Julian Field established a flour mill.

In 1860 Fort Worth won the county seat election over Birdville, but building of a courthouse was delayed by the Civil War. The building which was in process of construction after the war was destroyed by fire in 1873, and all documents were burned. Dr. W. P. Burts became mayor when the town was incorporated in 1873.

The Fort Worth Yuma, Arizona, stage line began operation in 1850. The Texas and Pacific Railroad reached Eagle Ford, twenty-six miles from Fort Worth, in 1873, and Fort Worth was designated as the next terminus, but the Panic of 1873 delayed completion of the line until 1876. A trading and supply depot for cattlemen driving herds up the north trails since the 1860's, Fort Worth immediately had stockyards organized and by 1878 had shipped 2,200 cars of cattle. The Gulf, Colorado, and Santa Fe reached Fort Worth in the early 1880's and was followed by the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas, the Missouri-Pacific, the Texas and New Orleans, and the Rock Island-Burlington lines. The Texas Electric Railway operated an inter-urban line between Fort Worth and Dallas between 1901 and 1934.

Public education began in Fort Worth in 1866, when the lower floor of the Masonic Hall was converted into a schoolroom. By 1885 the town had several private schools, a public high school, and the Academy of the Mount of St. Joseph. Other educational institutions include Our Lady of Victory College, Texas Christian University, Polytechnic College (later Texas Wesleyan College), and Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Early newspapers were the Whig Chief (1871), the Daily Democrat (1876), the Advance (1880), the Democrat-Advance (1882 to 1885), and the Gazette (1885 to 1898). The Fort Worth Star and Fort Worth Telegram united in 1910 to form the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. The Livestock Reporter, established in 1903, has been followed by several publications for cattlemen. Farm journals, oil gazettes, union organs, and various trade magazines also are published in the city.

Floods on the Trinity River, particularly in 1908, resulted in the damming of the West Fork of the river to create Lake Worth in 1915. Discovery of oil in the Wichita County area in 1911 and later oil development in Erath, Stephens, and Eastland counties made Fort Worth an oil well supply center and headquarters for offices of oil companies. Major industries in addition to the stockyards were flour milling and oil processing. Population rose from 6,663 in 1880 to 26,688 in 1900. Population rose from 163,447 in 1930 to 177,662 in 1940 and to 277,047 by 1950. In 1960 Fort Worth had 356,268 residents which by 1970 had increased to 393,476.

During the Texas Centennial in 1936, Fort Worth's major attraction was the Texas Frontier Centennial, a part of the traditional rivalry between Fort Worth and Dallas, cities said to cooperate only on the project for securing navigation of the Trinity River. Fort Worth grew in population during World War I with the location of Camp Bowie. During World War II the city was the location of a military depot. The Southwest Exposition and Fat Stock Show, an annual observance, attracts visitors to the city known as "Cowtown" and "Out Where the West Begins." The Fort Worth Industrial Exposition is held annually in May. Pioneers' Rest, a cemetery dating back to 1850, contains the graves of General Ripley A. Arnold and Edward H. Tarrant. Trinity Park and Botanic Gardens feature plants of the Southwest region.

In 1963 a new city council together with prominent businessmen generated new life into the city government. Within two years multimillion-dollar bond issues created funds for a lavish convention center encompassing fourteen blocks (completed in 1967), new schools, flood control and water conservation, a new sports arena, an airport near Grapevine, and numerous city improvements and salary advancements.

Also in 1963 the Arts Council of Greater Fort Worth was created by its citizens to raise funds for six cultural organizations. In 1967 the city had a symphony orchestra, civic opera association, community theater, and civic ballet organization. In July, 1958, the Casa Manana, a well-known theater-in-the-round, was opened, where outstanding musicals are presented. The Texas Boys Choir of Fort Worth is also well known. In 1962 and 1966 the Van Cliburn International Quadrennial Competition was held in Fort Worth. Museums include the Amon Center Museum of Western Art, the Fort Worth Museum of Science and History (which was formerly called the Fort Worth Children's Museum, and includes the Noble Planetarium), the Fort Worth Art Center Museum, the Kimbell Art Museum, and the Texas Christian University Natural History Museum.

One of the biggest tourist attractions in the metropolitan area is Six Flags Over Texas, a twelve-million dollar amusement park stressing the historic past of Texas.

at Mary Le Bone Spring, about three miles from the present site. Johnson Station was one of three towns in the county before 1876, when the railroad survey went three miles south and the settlement was moved to the present site and named Arlington at the suggestion of James Ditto. The surrounding area is devoted partially to livestock raising and dairying. Industries include the production of medicinal crystals and concentrated water from a deep mineral well and the growing and distribution of roses. Home of Arlington State College, the town had a population of 4,240 in 1940 and by 1950 had risen to 7,686. By 1960 population had climbed to 44,775 and to 90,643 by 1970.

Arlington was an industrial center by 1973, producing machinery, auto parts, rubber products, and chemicals. It is the site of a 5,800 industrial park, which was reported to be the largest of its kind in the nation. In 1957 a dam was completed, creating Lake Arlington in twenty-six days. In 1959 Arlington State College (now University of Texas at Arlington) was elevated to a four-year status and served the cultural needs of the community. The Six Flags Over Texas amusement park attracts thousands of tourists yearly.

Western artist Joe Grandee has watched his paintings increase in value from $300 to $30,000.

Western artist paints himself a new image

By Pat Gordon
Mid-Cities Bureau of The News

ARLINGTON — Joe Grandee lost his identity the day success found him in the mid-1960s. The unknown magazine illustrator became the prosperous Western artist, whose goatee and buckskin garb Buffalo Bill would have envied.

He was an oddity: a lone Western artist among the cubists.

"I picked up the image that people wanted. They wanted me to play the Western artist, and I fell into it. I did what they expected," Grandee said. "But I've backed off from playing that role. I've defined who I am, and I'm not a cowboy. I'm attempting to be more of a businessman who paints pictures."

Grandee, 52, replaced the buckskins with a conservative Western look — slacks, boots, turquoise jewelry, string tie — and the goatee with a mustache. He paints his Western scenes in relative anonymity on a 7-acre spread outside Arlington.

The urban cowboy vogue rescued Grandee from being an eccentric artist who refused to fill tautly stretched canvases with any subject except the Old West. Now he's seen as a leader, a modern day Remington or Russell, whose search for the Old West will become a 26-episode series on the Public Broadcasting System.

"I'm not complaining," he said with a grin and surrounded in his Arlington gallery by his works, which routinely sell for $30,000 to $50,000. "If Western art hadn't become what it is today, I couldn't do what I do now. It was nice to be the only one, but it's easier not having to convince everyone that Western art is worthwhile."

Grandee started drawing "back when I was so young I can't even remember the first." He would work for weeks on comic strip-like episodes to give to friends and help those less talented in art class to draw a cow or a rabbit. After graduating States — he dressed models for a pho session involving hundreds of shots ca turing them in action. After preliminar sketches, he was ready to paint.

"I'm doing what I really want to do now. Perhaps the hardness of the early years honed me, made me disciplined," he said, looking at the battle scene. "I've never been satisfied with a piece I've done. But before I die, I want to reach that peak I've strived for. To look at a piece and say, 'Joe, you're there. You've got it all this time.' I can't say that, yet."

Appreciation of History

Western artist Grandee paints a new image for himself from Forest Avenue High School in South Dallas, he attended art classes for a few months, where his Western art stood out among the more popular modern art style and "amused" his teacher.

He tried ranching in East Texas, "painting between chores which I neglected to do," until the drought of 1953 drove him from business.

"That's when I tried art as a living," he said. "I kept plugging away until it eventually paid off."

In the 1950s, Grandee trudged from gallery to gallery. But no one wanted his pictures of charging cavalry troops or war-weary Indians. Buyers demanded canvases filled with cubes or realism, not horses. He tried to sell his paintings for $25 or $35, but no one was interested. He ended up trading most of his early works for Western artifacts at antique and gun shows.

To earn a living, he turned to magazine illustrating. The local studios weren't interested in his illustrations. "They said I was too stylized, not versatile enough and suggested I go to New York."

New York firms recognized his talent as an artist but wanted him to produce World War II illustrations and sex pieces, which "I had no interest in," he said. He returned to Arlington and soon found a niche doing illustrations for True West and Frontier Times magazines.

While illustrating magazine covers and inside stories paid the bills, Grandee sharpened his drawing skills by studying anatomy and "logging a lot of time at the Amon Carter Museum studying Remington and Russell."

His paintings began to sell. In 1965, his career received a boost when a Houston dealer saw a calender Grandee illustrated and gave him a show. Almost overnight, his worth increased.

"I went from $300 a painting, which I thought was great, to $5,000, then $8,000, $10,000 and $25,000," he said. "I had to adjust to a whole different life."

Grandee entered a period that he looks back at with acute discomfort. He turned out works of art with as little care as he had earlier whipped out inexpensive illustration.

"I slipped into a hurry mode for a few years as the demand for my work became greater. I had had such a tough time financially that I hated to turn down the money," he said. "If people couldn't buy a Remington or a Russell, they bought a Grandee. I dashed paintings off rapidly. I got away from the original need to express myself, and my work wasn't that fantastic. It had a lot of rough edges.

"That work has come back to haunt me now. I wish I hadn't done it, but I learned a lesson."

Western art became the vogue about the time friends, dealers and agents began criticizing Grandee's paintings. Abashed, he stood back from the easel to look at his works.

"I realized the new Western artists' works were as good as what I was slopping out. I knew I had to paint fewer pictures — to stop taking off from major works to grind out not-so-great paintings," he said in a soft voice. "I'd rather turn out one good piece than 50 so-so pieces. I've become very meticulous."

Grandee's lastest work, "Custer's Last Stand," took more than nine months to paint. As he does with all his works, he researched the battle to the smallest detail. Using his collection of military and Indian memorabilia — decribed by the Smithsonian as the largest in the United States — he dressed models for a photo session involving hundreds of shots capturing them in action. After preliminary sketches, he was ready to paint.

"I'm doing what I really want to do now. Perhaps the hardness of the early years honed me, made me disciplined," he said, looking at the battle scene. "I've never been satisfied with a piece I've done. But before I die, I want to reach that peak I've strived for. To look at a piece and say, 'Joe, you're there. You've got it all this time.' I can't say that, yet."

TEXAS' FIRST TURKEY TROT of the season ended Saturday with the last carload of Thanksgiving birds for the North and East rolling out of the State. Exceeding all records for five years, more than 350 cars of turkeys were shipped in the past two weeks...The Fort Worth market closed with birds bringing 27 to 30 cents on foot. This will mean that after the freight charges and middlemen's profits have been added turkeys will sell retail in the big cities of the East at around 60 cents a pound...With Texas being the only State in the Union showing an increase in the production of turkeys this year, wholesale dealers here predict that the shipment east for the yule trade will be even greater than the Thanksgiving movement...

A BIT OF HISTORY by Ena Cate:

In 1846 the Indians came into Dallas and Collins counties and stole a lot of horses. The white people had organized in Dallas county a minute company to be ready to start immediately to follow the first Indians that came in the county, and my grandpa and some more men were putting up a house when a runner came and notified them that the Indians were in the country. They left immediately and went and got their horses and got some bread baked and a little parched coffee and corn and started that evening, which was the 6th day of December, 1846. They came the next day to where the Indians had killed a horse. On the third evening they overtook them on the head waters of Denton and killed and scalped three of them and brought their scalps home. That was the last horse-stealing done by the Indians in Dallas Co. The Indians were thought to be Comanche. Each one had eighteen big brass rings on his left arm above the elbow and had silver jewelry in his ears and nose. The brass rings were about the size of an ordinary lead pencil.

After the organization of Tarant county, an Indian chief called Iim Ned, with ten of his best hunters got permission from Major Arnold of Fort Worth to hunt bear on West Fork, Elm and Denton. They killed 60 big bear between Fort Worth and Dallas.

Grandpa was with them when they killed two. He belonged to the ranging crowd 12 months and they captured small companies of Deleware and Shawnee Indians going down to the buffalo range to kill buffalo, but they never did any harm. They were friendly and came to Kansas.

THE GRAPEVINE SUN — J.E. Keeling, Editor and Proprietor.

FROM THE GRAPEVINE SCHOOLS — We are just a little late in reporting our opening, Monday, Sept. 8th, and our progress since, but we have been too busy with our work to make a good news report. We had a nice opening with a number of friends present to encourage our work. Some good talks were made by our pastors and Messers. Wall, Anderson and Saunders. Our enrollment is now 75, something like 20 more than we had at the same time last year...We are all very proud of the new addition to our building. We will not be crowded this year, and of course we will all be more pleasantly situated...The musical department is a new feature of our school this year. Any who want either instrumental or vocal music can be accommodated. Miss Mussett is an excellent teacher...Hugh Anderson has been absent this week on account of sickness in his home...

AN ENJOYABLE SOCIAL — There was a social given by Mr. and Mrs. J.W. Huffman last Saturday night, in honor of Grapevine Brass Band. Quite a number of Grapevine's society people attended. The band furnished plenty of good music, which was enjoyed by all present. Later in the evening refreshments were served of which all partook heartily and enjoyed. After having a delightful time away into the night when the hours were growing short and the atmosphere chilly, the guests paid their best wishes to Mr. and Mrs. Huffman and departed for their respective homes, feeling that they had a grand good time.

MR. O.W. MOODY representing Hart's Medicine Co. of Lincoln, Ill., was in the Vine yesterday and gave the Sun office a pleasant call. He is not the great evangelist, who is trying to save souls, but he is trying to save the body by introducing Hart's Medicine Co.'s remedies. Mr. Moody struck us as a real courteous gentleman, high-toned in his language, pleasant in his address and very earnest and persevering in his business. For what we have seen of this gentleman we are inclined to believe that he is a right man in the right place, and Hart's Medicine Co. is fortunate in securing his services.

MR. J.T. FOSTER has purchased Mrs. R.M. Keen's home place, on Church Street, and has been very busy this week harvesting a large crop of big weeds, which he has placed in a huge pile, which we presume he is preparing to cremate. He is evidently preparing to plant a big crop of — something. Well we'll wait and see. We are inclined to believe he will put the whole thing in fruit and berries. Hope so, at least, for it will be mighty handy for us. We admire Jim's pluck, energy and bank account.

QUITE A BUNCH OF PEOPLE passed through the Vine on Last Thursday morning's train fresh from Marshall County, Tenn. They are looking for a new location with a view of settling in this area of the Lone Star State.

In some instances we can exert a wide influence by saying as little as possible.

True courtesy one never tires of witnessing.

It isn't always the man who lives the longest that lives the most.

A man celebrates his birthday, a woman seldom does.

You cannot convince a woman that marriage is a failure until she has given it a try.

Many a broken heart has been caused by underserved stigmas.

Sickness is the interest we pay on life's morgage.

Be sure that you hold up your end in your earthly duties.

When a woman is pleasant to everybody in the family it is a sign she has company.

Our actions are sometimes more offensive than our utterances.

Nothing hurts a chronic invalid as much as to tell him that he is looking well.

LARGE ATTENDANCE AT SCHOOL OPENING

The Grapevine Public Schools opened Monday morning, Sept. 13th with 250 pupils and a large number of patrons present. Supt. Farrington thanked the Trustees for the new improvements on buildings and grounds made during the summer. He also expressed the thanks of the School Board and pupils alike to the Bay View Club for the handsome drinking fountain and a contribution of money. ... He outlined some of the things the Schools will introduce and work for this year. We are to have a troop of Boy Scouts and all are urged to allow their boys to join. Also there is to be an organization for the girls, The Camp Fire Girls Club. A campaign is going to be carried on for a piano in the school. Mr. W.A. Starling started the fund with $1.00; we hope others may contribute...

EDITOR'S SOLILOQUIES — When a dearly beloved subscriber writes to us in irate vein; "Stop the paper. Never send the vile sheet to my home again." We just puff our sweet old corn cob, and we stroke the office cat; editors "don't have no feelings" — never mind — we're used to that.

When a typographical error sometimes creeps in by mistake, and our friends rush up to tell us what a first-rate ass we'd make, we just overlook their errors, never giving it tit for tat; editors are pachydermic, and — Oh well: we're used to that.

When our advertisers cancel, telling us the sheet's no good; when subscribers choose to pay us in tomatoes or cord wood, well, we simply grin and bear it though it leaves us rather flat; editors can exist somehow — somehow we get used to that.

When your daughter's graduation, or her wedding day comes around, you expect the kind of of write-up that in adjectives abound, do you ever stop to thank us, though it is done in great "eclat" that's what editors are there for, and Oh, well! We're used to that.

"THEY SAY" — It is a real conundum — Do men gossip more than women? Once, possibly not, but now, who knows? Many men in these days have little to do and perhaps they have become prone to gossip out of sheer ennui. At any rate, the charge is made that careless persons, more men than women, are too loose with their tongue, hinting at disaster to banks, and business firms, even those of the most solid character. The frequent users of "they say" are more thoughtless than malicious. misery loves company and they roll as delicious morsels urder their tongues street-corner gossip and idle tales that they take no pains to investigate...No honest citizen , however, who thinks at all, will steal reputations away by spreading false rumors.

Cowtown's cast rehearses for its six-week run at the Hip Pocket Theater.

Exuberant 'Cowtown' returns

Hip Pocket Theater's revival of Cowtown, an SRO hit recently at the White Elephant Saloon, will open Thursday for a six-week run at the troupe's outdoor theater on the Far West Side.

The exuberant musical history of Fort Worth replaces the originally scheduled Frankenstein, which has been postponed. All of the Cowtown principals will return to their roles — including Richard Harris as Marshal "Long Hair" Jim Courtright; Douglas Balentine as the wild man of the cloth, Rev. J. Frank Norris; Linda Boydston as the buckskin belle who symbolizes the city's growth, and Roxanna Rogers as the hostess of the Theater Comique.

Reservations at 246-9928.

The Hip Pocket family remains in a happy state of shock over the recent invitation to perform next year at the prestigious Edinburgh Festival. Two questions arose immediately: (1) How to finance the exporting of an entire production, and (2) What show to export.

The answer to Question No. 1 has to be that public and private philanthropy will flood the Hip Pocket when words gets out that a local performing organization has been thus singled out.

As for the second question: Hip Pocket's Lake Worth Monster has been mentioned, even though it is not as fresh or as representative of the group's style as it was a few years ago.

TCU's theater season opens Tuesday with Vanities, Jack Heifner's incisive comedy-drama which follows three female chums from high school frolics to post-college disillusionment. Director Gaylan Collier's cast includes Joy Mounts, Ellen McClurkin and Lisa Priddy.

Performances will be at 8 p.m. nightly through Saturday and at 2 p.m. Sunday in the University Theater on campus. Reservations at 921-7626.

Sojourner Truth Players, who'll be staging their fall rummage sale Saturday in the cultural arts center at 1101 Fabons, will audition actors Sept. 27 and 28 for On Golden Pond. Report to director Molly Faulk at 7 p.m. either night.

The scheduling of this show should be regarded as an important growth step for the city's first black community theater since it is not a black show, per se. In keeping with the trans-ethnic potential of the play, director Faulk (who staged the Scott Theater's recent Gin Game) reportedly is considering using an inter-racial cast.

STP Producer Charlece Thomas, meanwhile, is currently traveling the country scouting for new works by black playwrights.

Add Auditions: In Dallas, director Charles Dee Mitchell has announced tryouts for New Arts Theater's production of Rope, the 1929 thriller which became an Alfred Hitchcock movie.

Equity actors will be seen Sept. 25 from 1 to 4 p.m., non-Equity Sept. 26 from 6 to 10 p.m. The script calls for six men and two women with British dialects. For an audition appointment, phone (214) 761-9064.

'Cowtown' alive

Cowtown, Hip Pocket Theater's musical journey through Fort Worth history, will open Monday night in the White Elephant Beer Garden, where it will play a total of eight performances through Sept. 2.

The musical, which was Hip Pocket's inaugural show five years ago, is being revived with the help of grants from the Meadows Foundation of Dallas and the local Performing Arts Grant Program.

The Johnny Simons-Douglas Balentine work traces the city from the founding of Camp Worth in 1849 through the lawless cattle drive years and on to modern times. The production's setting is all the more appropriate, since the adjacent White Elephant Saloon in named for an actual tavern which was famous during the gunfight era.

Theater notes

Fort Worth actor Richard Harris, playing Marshal "Long Hair" Jim Courtright, will narrate the action and introduce such real-life characters as Rev. J. Frank Norris, played by composer Balentine, and early-day city father K.M. Van Zandt (Bruce Balentine). Also depicted will be Fort Worth pioneers Henry Daggett, John Peter Smith and Archibald Leonard.

Performances will start at 9 p.m. Advance tickets are on sale at the White Elephant. The reservations numbers are 624-8241 and 246-9928.

A. Cemetery Trust Fund- After receiving permission from the Commission at the July meeting, the first mailing was made to prospective donors. The mailing consisted of 15 Tarrant County businesses. Replies indicated that most had already committed their contribution funds for 1982. Another mailing is being considered for later this year. A positive response was received from Mr. Bayard Friedman on behalf of the Mary Potishman Lard Trust. He expressed interest in a challenge type of gift.

A resolution will be presented for the Commission's approval that sets out goals and requests that County Judge Mike Moncrief establish guidelines for administering the fund.

The Commission has an opportunity to set a precedent for other donors. Token donations from Commission members might provide the impetus needed for others to donate. It would also make a nice start for the fund, especially if the challenge gift comes through.

B. Horse Fountain- This project has been temporarily put on hold, until we are able to get a realistic cost estimate.

II. Budget- We are currently in the process of formulating our fiscal 1983 budget and proposal to the Commissioners' Court. A final budget will be brought before the Commission for approval at the November meeting. Input and recommendations are still welcome.

A. Marriage License Project- Inquiries continue to come in; the project has raised well over $2000 to date.

B. Cemetery Trust Fund- June 15, 1982 should be marked as a red-letter day. That is when the I.R.S. officially granted the fund tax-exempt status. Thank you, Bennett, for all your hard work in dealing with the bureaucracy to end all bureaucracies.

The committee is now proceeding with seeking corporate and individual contributions. A press release has been sent to all county newspapers and letters to corporations are ready to be mailed. And of course commission members are not prohibited from contributing or from seeking out contributions for the fund.

The fund already has $722.50.

C. Horse Fountain- We received a letter in late May from Mrs. Ruth Carter Johnson in response to our grant inquiry letter. She said the letter would be forwarded to the Amon G. Carter Foundation Board for consideration.

II. Budget- It is time to start planning a budget for fiscal 1983. A tenative budget proposal will be put together for consideration at the September meeting. Any input, recommendations, etc. are welcome.

Lodge plans open house

Members of Roanoke Masonic Lodge No. 668 will show off their remodeled quarters at an open house from noon-5 p.m. Saturday.

The downtown landmark structure, across the street from the new post office, was built in 1909 at a cost of $804 and has always been owned by the Masons.

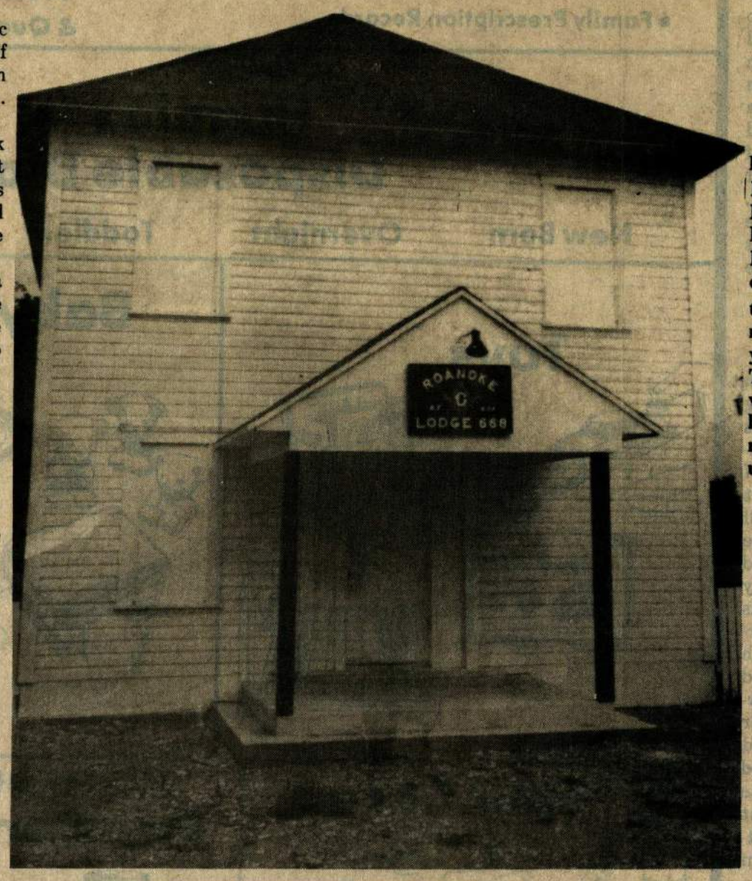
Last Oct. 1, the men built a new foundation and moved the two-story wooden building some 40 feet to the east. They also painted it, topped it with a new roof and installed new carpet throughout.

Visitors Saturday will see bits of history inside: the lodge's original roll-top desk, which is still very much in use, and photos of past Masters on the wall.

Masonic Lodge No. 668 was chartered Dec. 13, 1888.

The public is invited to the open house. Soft drinks will be served.

Lodge officers include Tun Foster, worshipful master; Terry Fairchild, junior warden; Ken Shaeff, senior warden; John Coleman, secretary; Matt Dillon, senior deacon; Ken White, junior deacon and chaplain O. J. Brock.



RENOVATED LANDMARK – Members of Roanoke Masonic Lodge No. 668 did the work themselves to remodel their 73 year-old home. The public is invited to an open house there from noon-5 p.m. Saturday.

Historical marker planted at Llano Estacado

The Liano Estacado, the flat plain that extends from central West Texas into New Mexico, has received an official Texas Historical Marker in the Mount Blanco Community, 10 miles north of Crosbyton at FM roads 193 and 651.

Indians and buffalo left the rising from the prairie along the Texas Caprock because of lack of water. But in 1876 search parties came in search of a likely spot for a ranch for Philadelphia cattleman Charles A. Tasker and an Irishman, Lord Jamison. They camped near the mouth of Blanco Canyon. It was the Law of 1887 which helped settle West Texas and provided for classification of land as farming or grazing land with a minimum price of $2 per acre.

The Texas Historical Commission has placed another marker on Waco's old extension bridge at 100 University Park Drive in Waco. After the Civil War, when Waco was a struggling town of 1,500, there were no bridges over the Brazos until the Waco Bridge Co. obtained a 25-year charter to operate a toll bridge.

In 1889 the structure was sold to McLennan County for $75,000 and tthe county gave the facility to the city of Waco.

The commission, state agency for historic preservation, with offices in Austin, provides services, publications and worksahops in the fields of restoration, archaeology, museum administration and cultural resources in addition to providing Texas official markers.

HISTORY

Half a million acres of undulating prairie . . . Elm and hackberry defy the prairie. Mesquite grows thin and stubborn . . . Cold wind and driving snow, dry gullies washed by April rain. Dry summers under the hot sun. Denton . . . . . .

from Fire on Abel's Alter by C. R. Taliaferro

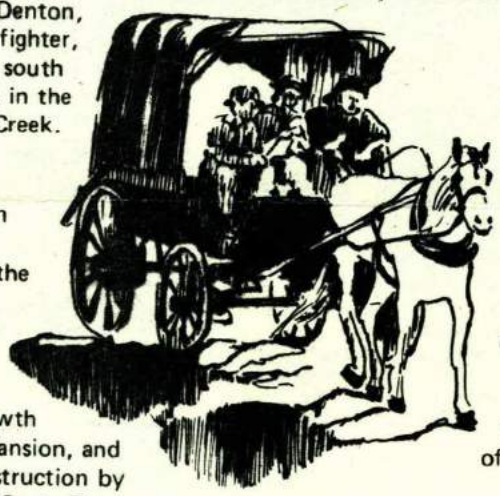
This 900 square mile area in North Central Texas, home of cattle baron John Chisum, and outlaw Sam Bass, was once a part of Red River County and in 1846 became Denton County. The original county seat, named Pinckeyville (located near the center of the present-day city of Denton) moved three times before settling in 1857 in Denton, the center-most point in the county. Both county and county-seat are named for John B. Denton, lawyer, preacher, and Ranger-Indian fighter, who was killed in 1841, near the south county line by Commanches in the Battle of Village Creek.



Anglo settlement first began in the early 1840's in the southeast portion of the county, and spread into the creek valleys of the Grand Prairie of Texas. When the Texas & Pacific Railroad built across the county in the late 1870's, subsistence farming and cattle-raising gave way to cotton and wheat farming. The growth of these two export industries, market expansion, and the Westward Movement, led to further construction by the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas (Katy); Santa Fe; Dallas and Wichita; and Frisco railroad lines through Denton County.

The first county courthouse was a small log structure built in Alton in south central Denton County. The second courthouse, built in Denton in 1857, burned in 1875 destroying many records of early Denton. A two-story brick courthouse, constructed on the site of the present structure, served until struck by lightning in 1894. The present county courthouse opened for county business in 1897, and continues to house many offices while serving as a National Register landmark for the people of Denton County.

Today, Denton County, home of North Texas State University (North Texas Normal College, est. 1890) and Texas Woman's University (College of Industrial Arts, est. 1901), is a center of higher education, as well as a balanced farming region producing wheat, cotton, beef, and dairy cattle. This county of once open range, contains two growing urban centers, Denton and Lewisville, both with increasing amounts of light manufacturing. Modern Denton County stands, today, as the northern gateway to the sprawling Dallas-Ft. Worth Metroplex.

State commemorates 137-year-old cemetery

By Jane Wolfe
Staff Writer of The News

WESTMINSTER, Texas — Martha Roland Arrington and her sons probably wouldn't have understood all the fuss Sunday.

After all, in their day, it would have been difficult to gather 200 people for any occasion — there were only 187 defenders at the Alamo — and things hadn't changed much when Ezekial Roland was buried in 1859.

But Sunday more than 200 people, including representatives of several North Texas historical societies, gathered at the Elm Grove Cemetery in the tiny Collin County community of Westminster to erect a Texas historical marker in memory of Ezekial Roland, one of Martha Arrington's three sons.

Ezekial, who held the first deed to the land, set aside the acreage for the cemetery and was buried there. His was the first grave.

That was 137 years ago.

The acreage, awarded in 1845, originally was included in a 1,920-acre Republic of Texas land grant to the family of John Roland, who was killed in Texas' war for independence against Mexico. The grant went to Ezekial, his mother and another brother, Sherrod Roland.

See STATE on Page 16A.

Ezekial's 6th-generation nephew, Scott Ulrich of Richardson, said Sunday he is certain his relatives were the first landowners in the area.

"When the Republic of Texas was founded, there were no deed records, so the deeds my relatives received probably were the first in the state," said Ulrich, who has traced his family roots back to the Rolands.

Record show that during the 10 years in which Texas was a Republic, land grants were awarded to more than 40 million acres — to encourage settlement, reward veterans of the war against Mexico, and to pay debts of the new republic and to finance its operations.

During the ceremonies Sunday, many of those attending took time to view Ezekial's tombstone, which stands on a hill and is shaded by trees. On one side of the marker is Ezekial's name with the years 1835-1859. On the other side is the name of his wife, Mahala A. (Pace), above the year 1832.

"We don't know if she (Mahala) is buried there beside him, though" Ulrich said.

"You know, I'll bet she remarried," said Tommie Ulrich, Scott's mother. "He was not an old man when he died and in those days, out in this tough country, a woman had to have a husband."

Ulrich said he is not curious enough to determine if Ezekial's wife is buried next to her husband at the cemetery, which has been cleaned up and is being maintained by an association of area residents. "Our records on who's buried in the cemetery are based on the markers and what people in the town remember," Ulrich said.

Some of the markers tell stories of "battles with Indians" and people who "lost their lives to wild animals."

The cemetery contains some modern tombstones and its records have been updated, but more than 250 of the 1,750 graves are unknown.

One of Martha Arrington's sons — Sherrod — is not buried in the Elm Grove Cemetery.

"We're now going to try to have Sherrod's land commemorated, too" Ulrich said. "He is buried with his family in a small plot, but we found a lot of history here that we didn't expect.

"Who knows what we might find?"

Dear Mr. Gage:

I had the occasion to attend a historical marker dedication in Collin County on May 2. The marker was for the Elm Grove Cemetery near Westminster, Texas. I introduced myself to Mrs. Elizabeth Pink, president of the Collin County Historical Society, as a member of the Tarrant County Historical Commission. She was quite pleased a member of our commission attended. She asked for your address so our commission could be placed on our mailing list.

I have enclosed a copy of the programme and an article which appeared in the Dallas Morning News. It was a good ceremony, and I am glad I was able to attend.

Sincerely,

David Dunnett

ADVANCED STUDIES IN VISUAL RESOURCES: Preservation of Historic Black and White Photographic Materials

Advanced Studies in Visual Resources is a program of workshops and symposia sponsored by The University of Texas at Austin. It is designed to promote the exchange of knowledge, techniques, and information among administrators, librarians, curators, and conservators of collections of visual materials. Specialized programs include cataloging and access, conservation and preservation, administration and management, and facilities and equipment. There will be a scheduled rotation of topics so that certain important seminars can be repeated. General seminars will also be offered, followed by more specialized, hands-on workshops to build on what the seminars presented.

The Preservation of Historic Black and White Photographic Materials conference will address individuals and organizations whose responsibilities include black and white photographic artifacts. This particular conference is one of the primary introductory units of the Advanced Studies in Visual Resources program. It will provide basic information relative to the preservation of the photographic image, the history and chemistry of nineteenth-century photographic processes, collection and preservation, approaches to organization and access of materials, identification of processes, deterioration and stabilization, and the storage and display of black and white photographs.

Sponsored by THE TEXAS HISTORICAL RECORDS ADVISORY BOARD and hosted by
THE DALLAS HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Earlier this year, the Texas Historical Records Advisory Board (THRAB) sent survey questionnaires to 443 manuscript repositories, including local libraries, museums, college and university collections, local historical societies, and special libraries; and local governmental agencies including city, county, district offices, and regional councils of government. These questionnaires were designed to assist THRAB to assess the needs and problems of those agencies charged with collecting, preserving, and making available to users historical papers and records. The survey revealed, among other facts:

A. a deep-seated need for statewide compilation and distribution of information regarding institutional holdings and services;
B. a need for publication of a union list of Texas-related archival holdings;
C. a strong expression of need for services in records management, paper conservation, and microfilming;
D. the interest of many institutions to participate in a consortium of archives and historical manuscript repositories which could address the needs listed above.

THRAB cordially invites your institution to send a representative to participate in a public forum on September 9, 1982, to discuss the establishment of a Texas Archival Network to serve as:

* a statewide historical records information system;
* a program to produce a union list of Texas-related archival and manuscript collections;
* a system for sharing holdings via microfilm, audio tape, and/or other reproducible medium;
* an organization to coordinate technical services and programs.

Funds for the forum were provided by a grant from the National Historical Publications and Records Commission.

IN TIMES OF CHANGE, LET YOUR FAITH REMAIN CONSTANT

Sooner or later, most of us will undergo some kind of a major change, and a prime example of one that can cause much confusion and turmoil is moving to a new home or a different city. Whatever the reason, it is bound to disrupt the lives of all concerned: for example, if your children have to attend a new school as a result. Trying to inform everyone of the move and adapting to new surroundings can be chaotic indeed. However, the one element in your life that should not change is your faith, for it can be a stabilizing force during this hectic time. So if possible, continue to attend your House of Worship. If not, find one in your new location that will meet your spiritual needs. Above all, remember that the love of God will follow you and remain with you, wherever you may happen to be.

Dear Mr. Gage:

I had the occasion to be in Tyler, Texas on January 14, and I took the opportunity to visit with Randal Gilbert, Esq., the newly elected president of the Smith County Historical Commission. I also met with his mother, Mrs. Loy Gilbert, who is a member of the Commission. We spent an hour, or so, discussing our mutual problems and solutions within our respective Commissions.

Since Smith County is smaller in regards to population, the county commissioners made the Smith County Historical Society the Smith County Historical Commission, therefore the members serve a dual rôle. The Society has the envious position of having their own museum. The museum exists on a donation basis, and a small income is realized. The Commission is funded by the county.

To keep communications opened between our respective Commissions, I feel it would be a good idea for a mutual exchange of newsletters. In the event you find this feasable, Mr. Gilbert's address is: 603 South Bois 'd Arc, Tyler, Texas, 75701.

Sincerely etc.,

THE DR. H. V. COPELAND HOME - GRAND PRAIRIE MUSEUM

Early Grand Prairie resident Barney P. Hale and his wife Ruth built this home for their family in 1902. The white clapboard residence, which features narrow windows and a high pitched roof, is typical of early area farmhouses. In 1908 the Hales sold their home to local physician Doctor Horace Victor Copeland (1975-1969).

A native of the pioneer Watson Community in Tarrant County, now part of the City of Arlington, Dr. Copeland was educated at Barnes University in St.Louis and Fort Worth University, where he graduated with a medical degree in 1901. After practicing medicine in Euless for a year, he moved to Grand Prairie, then a small Railroad town of 500 people. Here he served residents of the surrounding rural area, often making calls on horseback. During his local medical career, which spanned more than fifty years, he delivered over 4,000 babies.

Dr. Copeland was a prominent community leader and was active in the First Presbyterian Church and the Sam R. Hamilton Masonic Lodge. He and his wife Frances Willard Watson Copeland were the parents of two children, Frances and H. Victor.

Following Dr. Copeland's death in 1969, the family home was owned by a grandson, Wayne Noble Doyal. (1982)

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS, a benefit for the new Museum of San Diego History, is presented by the San Diego Historical Society. For this inaugural event we are fortunate to be able to utilize the space which will house this exciting new museum in early 1983.

Celebrate is delighted to present a dazzling display and exhibit of the best in holiday design, created by imaginative and talented interior designers, florists, jewelers, landscape designers, and collectors. These holiday room vignettes and fantasy Christmas trees are paired with distinguished celebrity hosts and hostesses to express their personalities, occupations, interests and talents.

Be sure to visit the Gift Shop overflowing with delightful holiday gifts. Among these items are to be found unique stocking stuffers and Christmas tree ornaments, children's clothes, silk lingerie, Appalachian baskets, pottery works, kitchen accessories, and many other useful and decorative gifts. The Gift Shop is located next to the trolley (Exhibit 1) and will be open throughout the show.

For the convenience of persons visiting Celebrate the Holidays, the Society will operate a Coffee House, offering for sale food items such as croissants, French pastries, quiches, coffees and wine.

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS is the start of a San Diego tradition—a party that will help preserve the past for the pleasure of the present and the future.

nd Director's Messages

Welcome to CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS

On behalf of the Board of Directors and all of us here at the San Diego Historical Society, I want to thank you for joining us in this holiday celebration. Together we will kick off the holiday season with this exciting and dynamic event.

"Celebrate The Holidays" is being sponsored by the Society as a benefit for our new Museum of San Diego History Capital Campaign Building Fund. This new museum is the most ambitious project ever undertaken by the Society. The new museum will trace San Diego's history from 1850 to the present in a most interesting way. The exhibits will include a re-creation of Horton's wharf and Fifth Avenue with full-size buildings. The sights and sounds of this exciting period of San Diego's history will come alive to the visitors in these "environmental" exhibits. We have nearly reached the halfway mark in this two million dollar effort and "Celebrate The Holidays" is going to be important in generating both additional dollars as well as interest and attention toward this exciting new museum.

Best wishes for the holiday season. And thank you for your interest in preserving San Diego's rich historical heritage.

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS, a benefit for the new Museum of San Diego History, is presented by the San Diego Historical Society. For this inaugural event we are fortunate to be able to utilize the space which will house this exciting new museum in early 1983.

Celebrate is delighted to present a dazzling display and exhibit of the best in holiday design, created by imaginative and talented interior designers, florists, jewelers, landscape designers, and collectors. These holiday room vignettes and fantasy Christmas trees are paired with distinguished celebrity hosts and hostesses to express their personalities, occupations, interests and talents.

Be sure to visit the Gift Shop overflowing with delightful holiday gifts. Among these items are to be found unique stocking stuffers and Christmas tree ornaments, children's clothes, silk lingerie, Appalachian baskets, pottery works, kitchen accessories, and many other useful and decorative gifts. The Gift Shop is located next to the trolley (Exhibit 1) and will be open throughout the show.

For the convenience of persons visiting Celebrate the Holidays, the Society will operate a Coffee House, offering for sale food items such as croissants, French pastries, quiches, coffees and wine.

CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS is the start of a San Diego tradition—a party that will help preserve the past for the pleasure of the present and the future.

President's and Director's Messages

HALLELUJAH

Welcome to the San Diego Historical Society's first annual "Celebrate The Holidays". This extravaganza is for the benefit of the new Museum of San Diego History in the Casa de Balboa in Balboa Park.

I invite all of you to share with me the event of the year for the Historical Society. The twenty thousand square feet of space on the main floor will display the talents of many designers from throughout Southern California. This festive occasion has been planned and put together through the efforts of the entire Society, but two of our greatest supporters, Kay Porter and Jill Porter are responsible for suggesting and organizing the event.

This pre-holiday extravaganza will dazzle your eyes, blow your mind, tickle your funny bone and fill your heart with warmth and cheer for the coming holiday season.

I want to thank all of those who have donated of their time, talent, and money to make this event possible.

To all who attend this Gala, may your heart be filled with Holiday Cheer and Good Will. Come and "Celebrate the Holiday" with us.

Full of Holiday Cheer,

RICHARD E. BOWERS, M.D.
President
San Diego Historical Society

Welcome to CELEBRATE THE HOLIDAYS

On behalf of the Board of Directors and all of us here at the San Diego Historical Society, I want to thank you for joining us in this holiday celebration. Together we will kick off the holiday season with this exciting and dynamic event.

"Celebrate The Holidays" is being sponsored by the Society as a benefit for our new Museum of San Diego History Capital Campaign Building Fund. This new museum is the most ambitious project ever undertaken by the Society. The new museum will trace San Diego's history from 1850 to the present in a most interesting way. The exhibits will include a re-creation of Horton's wharf and Fifth Avenue with full-size buildings. The sights and sounds of this exciting period of San Diego's history will come alive to the visitors in these "environmental" exhibits. We have nearly reached the halfway mark in this two million dollar effort and "Celebrate The Holidays" is going to be important in generating both additional dollars as well as interest and attention toward this exciting new museum.

Best wishes for the holiday season. And thank you for your interest in preserving San Diego's rich historical heritage.

Michael E. Patterson of Colleyville, a member of the Tarrant County Historical Commission, was selected as "Best Committee Member" in Texas in 1981, in recognition for his extensive work in obtaining historical markers, cemetery preservation, research, and education.

Patterson and several other members of the commission attended the 1982 Annual Historic Preservation Conference, April 15-17, in Brenham, and returned with special awards for the county organization's work in 1981.

The Tarrant County Historical Commission consists of about 25 citizens appointed by Tarrant County Commissioners Court to initiate and conduct projects to preserve local history. The annual conference is sponsored by the Texas Historical Commission, the official state agency for historical preservation. Gov. William P. Clements, Jr., presented the awards at a special luncheon.

Among Patterson's achievements in local preservation are historical markers for Hood Cemetery, Easter Cemetery, Minters Chapel Methodist Church, Mt. Gilead Baptist Church, Mt. Gilead Cemetery, Witten Cemetery, and Spring Garden Community. He has completed research on several other historic sites and marker applications are pending. He has also coordinated the restoration of several area pioneer cemeteries.

The commission's achievements for 1981 included the successful application for 26 official Texas historical markers.

The group presented more than 30 programs and speeches and conducted over 40 tours of historic sites in the county. The commission raised nearly $10,000 for a project to microfilm endangered local history resources and wrote more than 400 letters to carry out its program of work. Three workshops on historical preservation were conducted in 1981.

The commission's 1981 quarterly newsletter was judged "Best Newsletter" by the Texas Historical Commission.

Mrs. W. Albert Schmidt, Fort Worth, was declared "Best Committee Chairman" in Texas in 1981 for her achievements as head of the commission's Archieves Committee.

Historical commission receives awards

The Tarrant County Historical Commission won four state awards for outstanding accomplishments in the field of Texas heritage conservation.

The awards were presented by Gov. Bill Clements at the 1982 Annual Historic Preservation Conference in Brenham. The conference is sponsored by the the Texas Historical Commission (THC), the state agency charged with historical preservation.

The Tarrant County Historical Commission won the state awards for distinguished service and best newsletter. Individual awards were received by Mrs. Albert Schmidt for best committee chairman and Michael Patterson for best commission member.

About 25 persons make up the Tarrant County Historical Commission. Each is appointed by the county commissioner's court to initiate and conduct projects to preserve local history.

"We are fortunate in having dedicated, capable preservationists volunteering their time and efforts to protect the community's heritage. Tarrant County is changing so rapidly at the present time. We who serve on the commission remain aware of the critical nature of our task," said county commission chairman Duane Gage who accepted the Distinguished Service Award.

The commission's achievements during 1981, the period for which the awards were given, included the successful application for 26 official Texas historical markers, and presenting more than 30 programs and speeches and conducting over 40 tours of historic sites in the county.

The commission also raised nearly $10,000 to microfilm endangered local history resources and held three workshops on historical preservation.

Mrs. Schmidt won an award as best committee chairman in recognition of her work on the county commission's Archives Committee. She led her committee in securing old papers, documents and records relating to the history of Tarrant County, Gage said.

She also organized an annotated bibliography of county source materials and reached an agreement between the historical commission and the Fort Worth Public Library to develop a joint city-county archives, he said.

Patterson received his award as best commission member for his active role in the commission's historical marker and cemetery preservation programs. He wrote and researched applications for more than 15 Tarrant County markers last year, said Gage.

The Distinguished Service Award was presented to 28 county commissions which accomplished outstanding preservation objectives and projects is 16 categories. Three counties received outstanding newsletter awards, a THC spokesman said.

Historians attend annual conference

Several members of the Tarrant County Historical Commission attended the 1982 Annual Historic Preservation Conference, April 15-17, in Brenham, Texas, and returned with special awards for the county organization's work in 1981.

The Tarrant County Historical Commission consists of about 25 citizens appointed by Tarrant County Commissioners Court to initiate and conduct projects to preserve local history. The annual conference is sponsored by the Texas Historical Commission, the official state agency for historical preservation.

Accepting the "Distinguished Service Award" for the local historical commission's work for 1981 was Duane Gage, Chairman, an Associate Professor of History at Tarrant County Junior College's Northeast Campus. The commission's achievements for 1981 included the successful application for 26 official Texas historical markers. The group presented more than 30 programs and speeches and conducted over 40 tours of historic sites in the county. The commission raised nearly $10,000 for a project to microfilm endangered local history resources and wrote over 400 letters to carry out its program of work. Three workshops on historical preservation were conducted in 1981.

The commission's 1981 quarterly newsletter was judged "Best Newsletter" by the Texas Historical Commission.

Receiving special honor as "Best Committee Member" in Texas in 1981 was Michael E. Patterson, Colleyville, in recongnition for his extensive work in the historical marker program, cemetery preservation, research, and education.

Mrs. W. Albert Schmidt, Fort Worth, was declared "Best Committee Chairman" in Texas in 1981 for her achievements as head of the commission's Archives Committee. Mrs. Schmidt conducted many tours, oral interviews, and research projects, and compiled extensive local history material. She has also led the Tarrant County Historical Commission's efforts to establish a joint city-county archives facility where in local public and private documents and papers can be housed and made available to students and researchers.

"We are fortunate in having dedicated, capable preservationists volunteering their time and efforts to protect the community's heritage," said Gage, who has been the group's chairman for th epast three years. "Tarrant County is changing so rapidly at the present time. We who serve on the commission remain aware of the critical nature of our task."

In addition to coordinating the historical marker program and collecting documents and artifacts of Tarrant County history, the Tarrant County history, the Tarrant County Historical Commission promotes the preservation and restoration of historic structures.

Conference looks at future of history

By RAYMOND TEAGUE
Star-Telegram Writer

They're not your "card-carrying" preservationists or your "8 to 5" preservationists, said Gregory Free of Austin, executive director of the Texas Historical Foundation.

They are the historic preservationists of the '80s: Architects, investors, lawyers, business leaders, the media, to name a few.

Look around you, the role of the preservationist has changed. It's not just "little old ladies in tennis shoes" or professional preservationists.

More and more people in varied occupations and professions, as individuals and within corporations and businesses, are getting involved and that's healthy, Free said during the sixth annual Texas Heritage Conference, which concluded this weekend at Fort Worth's Hyatt Regency Hotel.

And what's more, throughout the country it's becoming more acceptable to be a preservationist, he said, with Texas among the leaders of the states and Fort Worth among the state's leading history-minded cities.

"It (preservation) always will be a long haul," Free said, but both Free and Dakota Sterling of Houston, chairman of the Texas Heritage Council, the Foundation's activist arm sponsoring the conference, said the times are optimistic for preservationism.

"PRESERVATIONISM is slowly but surely becoming a priority for people," said Free, whose non-profit organization represents the private sector's involvement in historic preservation. "They are realizing the quality of the past pays off in more ways than one."

First, it can pay off economically now, Free said.

The federal Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, which went into effect in January 1982, already has made great influence in Texas, he said.

"The act allows such significant tax benefits for rehabilitation of historic buildings," Free said, "up to 25 percent investment tax credit for a certified rehabilitation of a historic property... It's not like a deduction; you do all the tax calculations and then take 25 percent off the top."

Because of this act, Free said, "For the first time, historic preservationists not only have an even standing, we have an edge."

Also, Free said, people are realizing that preserving historical buildings raises the esthetic level of the physical environment, citing the restored Hyatt as a perfect example.

Please see Meeting on Page 4

Meeting looks to past for future

"A lot of parts of the country right now change almost daily, weekly, yearly," Free said. "A sense of place is very important.

"It's unfortunate today, you tell someone to turn at such and such a building and that building may not be there."

COMPETITION FOR the land is fierce, Sterling said. "By and large, the large corporations want to tear down all the old buildings and put up skyscrapers.

"I think there certainly can be a blend," she added. "I don't think we ought to stop building new skyscrapers; we ought to preserve what other generations have left for us. It can be done."

That doesn't mean, Free added, that preservationists want to save every old building. "We want to save the things worth saving or are useful.

"We want the quality of the past to co-exist with the quality of the present," he said, a philosophy that was not carried out during the '50s and '60s when buildings were torn down left and right under the name of urban renewal.

"We don't think everything in the world ought to be saved, but if people are honest with themselves about the buildings, environmentally and esthetically, I think a lot of these buildings will be saved naturally."

An honest look by developers and others interested in the preservation of historic structures from a business and practical standpoint is becoming increasingly commonplace, he said.

Most of the historic preservation interest in the state, Free said, is in the smaller towns, such as Granbury, Plano, San Marcos, Georgetown and Galveston, but large cities, too, have major historic preservation projects going for commercial and residential uses.

FORT WORTH preservationists, Free said, don't brag enough about what they've done.

He praised, among others, the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County for its current countywide inventory of historic structures, and Bass Brothers Enterprises, owner of City Center and Sundance Square. The latter, Free said, "is a landmark development for historic preservation in Texas."

Robert Bass, vice president of Bass Brothers Enterprises, spoke at the conference which attracted about 100 people from throughout the state.

Bass detailed his company's involvement in the Main Street "patchwork" of rehabilitation and reproduction, and said investors in historic preservation should be realistic and aware what they are getting into.

"Historic preservation from an investor's standpoint has more risks than building a new building," Bass said.

In itself, Sundance Square is not an attractive investment, Bass said, but when one considers how it will enhance the nearby Americana Hotel and City Center towers, it becomes very important. It will provide restaurants, shops and scenic diversity for these high-rises.

Bass urged preservationists to have documented arguments of potential economic gains before approaching investors with historic preservation projects.

IN KEEPING with the conference theme "Showcasing Historical Preservation: What's New That's Old!" speakers from a variety of occupations were on the program to show how they approach preservationism.

Clark Strickland, who heads the National Trust for Historic Preservation, Southwest Plains Regional Office in Denver, attempted to define a preservationist.

"Preservationists can see with educated eyes," he said. "Preservationists have an eye to the future — an appreciation to the past which leads to action to save our nation's heritage.

"It is backward looking in a sense but very, very forward in action."

He, too, emphasized that preservationists today aren't purists, and that those in the movement come from many areas of skills and interests.

Also, historical preservation action comes at many levels, Strickland said, but the local level is the most important. "It's on the local level where buildings really are saved."

It's very advantageous for the historical preservation movement to be thought of by legislators as a strong grass-roots movement, Nellie Longsworth, president of Preservation Action in Washington, D.C., a national, non-profit lobbying group, told conference participants.

She said historical preservation can be approached by lobby groups in a number of ways, such as as an energy issue, a quality of life issue, and an employment incentive. The most successful right now, she said, is the angle of the economic benefits of historic preservation.

"People must understand historical preservation in those terms at this time," she said.

State Heritage Council To Meet in Fort Worth

The Texas Heritage Council will hold its annual conference at the Hyatt Regency Hotel Sept. 10 and will spotlight the state's most exciting and innovative preservation.

An awards lunch on Sept. 11 will conclude the conference.

Speakers will include Robert M. Bass of Bass Brothers Enterprises, Fort Worth; Georgetown designer Laura Weir-Clarke, newspaperman Max Lale of Marshall and Nellie Longsworth, the president of Preservation Action, Washington.

"The success of the historical preservation movement in Texas is due to the hard work of many people, some of whom don't necessarily call themselves preservationists. These are the preservationists of the 1980's: business leaders, investors, lawyers, and the media, just to name a few," said Dakota Sterling, chairman of the council.

Old Cemeteries

Evelyn Cushman, who wrote a book about early cemeteries in northeast Tarrant County, spoke on that subject Tuesday at a meeting of the Northeast Historical Society in the Euless Public Library.

What's new that's old?

The success of the historic preservation movement in Texas is due to the hard work of many people—some of whom aren't known primarily as preservationists. In Texas and across the nation, historic preservation has provided a forum for individuals of all disciplines who are concerned with the past, as well as the quality of life in the present and future.

The Texas Heritage Council is pleased to offer "Showcasing Historic Preservation," a conference in which Texas' most exciting and innovative preservation projects will be discussed and displayed. Those presenting these projects represent a cross section of the diverse group known as "preservationists" in the 1980's: business leaders, developers, lawyers, and media professionals, to name a few.

The fact is, everyone can play an important role in the preservation of Texas' past. We invite you to join us September 10–11 at the Hyatt Regency Fort Worth—to learn more about what's happening in historic preservation today, and about how you can get involved.

THE TEXAS HERITAGE COUNCIL AWARD OF MERIT has been named in honor of JUDGE JAMES E. WHEAT (1887–1968). Born at Chester, in Tyler County, Judge Wheat was a descendant of Dr. Josiah Wheat, one of the earliest Anglo-American settlers of the region and a donor of the land on which the original Tyler County courthouse was situated. Asked by Governor Shivers to chair the Texas State Historical Survey Committee when it was created in 1953, Judge Wheat took the lead in organizing the Texas Historical Foundation. The widely respected Judge served as the first president of both organizations, bringing much needed early prestige to historic preservation in Texas. A graduate of the UT law school, Judge Wheat was president of the Class of 1914. He was a veteran of World War I, served on the Texas Prison Board from 1942–1948, and was a director of the Houston branch of the Federal Reserve Bank.

"Showcasing Historical Preservation: What's New That's Old!" will be the theme of the sixth annual Texas Heritage Conference presented by the Texas Heritage Council here next month.

The conference, Sept. 10-11 at the Hyatt Regency, will spotlight some of the state's most innovative preservation projects by looking at the many different professions involved in the preservation movement.

Council Chairman Dakota Sterling said the preservationists of the 1980s, who don't always call themselves preservationists, include business leaders, investors, lawyers and the media.

Speakers will include Robert M. Bass of Bass Brothers Enterprises in Fort Worth, Georgetown designer Laura Weir-Clarke and Nellie Longsworth, president of Preservation Action, Washington, D.C.

Historical preservation awards will be presented during the conference. The awards are designed to recognize significant achievements of nonprofit heritage organizations and members and to give statewide exposure to their work.

Of 170 historically significant structures in downtown Fort Worth, 57 are buildings that might be eligible for the National Register of Historic Places, says the executive director of the Historic Preservation Council of Tarrant County.

The structures include the W.T. Waggoner and Burk Burnett buildings downtown; homes surrounding the downtown area; churches such as First United Methodist Church, Mount Gilead Baptist Church and Allen Chapel AME Church; lodge halls; Haltom's clock; the old Paddock Viaduct, the nation's first self-supporting, reinforced concrete bridge; and a row of clustered houses on East First Street, said Michael Collins.

Survey views area's historic structures

"I would say offhand that Fort Worth has one hell of a history," said architectural historian Woody Minor of San Francisco.

And it's all there for the looking — if you know where and how to look.

"One of the wonderful, wonderful things is that when your eyes are opened to architecture . . . you have a living museum," Minor said. "The history is there for you."

But if your eyes haven't been opened, you might want to consult a report to the Historic Preservation Council that was produced by the California firm for which Minor works.

The recently completed report identifies about 240 historic structures — buildings, bridges, cemeteries and more — in Fort Worth's Central Business District and in Grapevine. And that's just the start of the biggest historical survey of its kind ever done in the United States.

"The ultimate goal of this organization is to complete a survey of the whole county," Collins said. "But that will take several years, and it will depend on our funding."

Charles Hall Page and Associates of San Francisco is doing the survey, which eventually will cost $250,000, Collins said. Company experts, armed with a 1947 map of Tarrant County, prowl county roads and categorize anything that was built before 1945 and might be historically significant.

"Someone might say that's obvious — you see what's there," said Minor, who has done much of the field work for the local survey. "But it's not really obvious. You have to begin seeing patterns, putting all the pieces together like a puzzle, and then maybe you begin to approach accuracy and truth about what's there."

"You know you have a lot of old buildings," said Marty Craddock, chairman of the council's survey committee, "but you don't know which are more valuable than others."

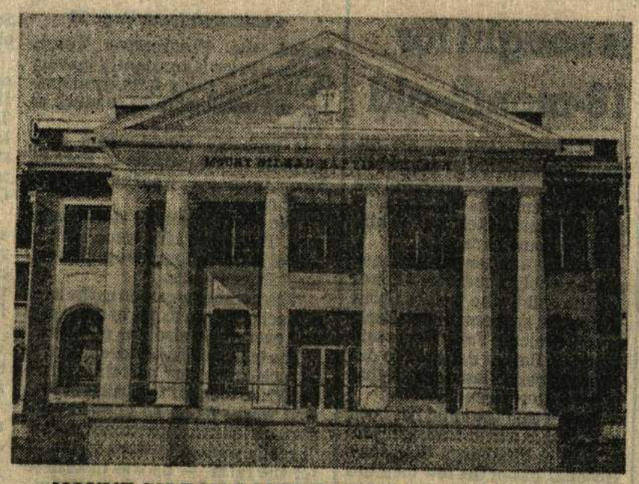
Copies of the preliminary report, about 250 pages, can be reviewed at the council's office at 1110 Penn St.

Mrs. Craddock said final reports, with a few added maps, will be available for sale in late January. The reports also will be available for inspection at City Hall and at the downtown public library, she said.

"The final product is a valuable management tool, not only for city and county officials but also for potential investors," Collins said. "The purpose of this is not to save every old building. The purpose is to delineate between those that are worthy and those that are not."

"A work of urban design or architecture will be that much more effective if it blends in with what's already there," Minor said. "It's something we're just learning to do. We're learning how to build and rebuild our cities instead of just tearing down and starting over."

Field work for the second phase of the survey — covering parts of southeast, northeast and northwest Tarrant County — was completed about two weeks ago, and reports are expected next summer.



MOUNT GILEAD BAPTIST CHURCH . . . historic site

In 1983, the council hopes to focus on Fort Worth's South Side.

"We think it's probably of the greatest density as far as historical interest is concerned and perhaps most in danger with all the new development going on," Collins said.

By the end of Phase 2, the council — a coalition of 30 neighborhood, historical and business organizations formed three years ago — will have spent about $70,000 on the survey, he said. That includes about $35,000 in federal matching grants, funneled through the Texas Historical Commission, and donations and proceeds from the Designer Showcase series, which the council sponsored.

The survey results will become part of a statewide historic sites inventory that the Texas Historical Commission hopes to complete by the end of the century and that will be part of a national inventory, Collins said.

Concert celebrates 50th

CISSY

No place on earth can do for people what Fort Worth does," Norwood Dixon said Friday at the concert celebrating the 50th anniversary of his marriage to the former Elizabeth Luedtke of Fort Worth, and the 17th anniversary of their moving back to Fort Worth. The Dixons observed their anniversary with a concert played in Orchestra Hall by two of the young musicians they have befriended, Robert Davidovici, violinist and concertmaster of both the Fort Worth Symphony Orchestra and the Texas Little Symphony, and Zhu Daming, finalist in the Van Cliburn Piano Competition from the People's Republic of China and currently a student at the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

Assisting Mr. and Mrs. Dixon at the reception after the concert were their daughter, Ann, who is Mrs. Robert Olsen; their sons, Norwood Dixon Jr. of San Antonio and David Dixon; Mrs. Dixon's mother, Mrs. J. A. Luedtke; and the Dixon grandchildren, Norwood Dixon III and Jeffrey Roberts of San Antonio; Lynn Marie, Paul and Todd Dixon; and Catherine Curby, who turned pages for pianist Zhu.

Staub-designed home FW's 1982 Showhouse

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Dupree, at 4926 Crestline overlooking River Crest Country Club, has been selected as Fort Worth's 1982 Showhouse, a project of the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County.

The showhouse, scheduled to be open Oct. 9 to 17, will display the talents of several local designers. Each will design one room.

The Dupree home was built for John Porter King, then president of King Candy Co., and was designed in 1928 by Houston architect John F. Staub. Staub is known for his work on Houston's Bayou Bend, which he designed for Ima Hogg, and numerous other residences and public buildings throughout the South.

Such special events as an invitational preview, luncheon style shows and a tea room for visitors are planned in conjunction with the showhouse. Last year more than 5,000 people toured the council's first showhouse, the home of Dr. and Mrs. John Jeffers on Elizabeth Boulevard.

Proceeds from this year's project will be used for a Tarrant County historic resources survey. Conducted by Charles Hall Page and Associates Inc., the study will identify architecturally, historically or culturally significant buildings, sites, structures and districts to provide a basis for future planning and historic preservation.

The showhouse will be open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Oct. 9 and 11-16, and 1 to 6 p.m. Oct. 10 and 17. Tickets are $5 per person in advance, $5.50 at the door. Information is available from 338-0267.

Historic society hosts reception

The Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County will be hosting a reception in conjunction with the 1982 Texas Heritage Conference from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m. Friday at the Knights of Pythias Hall, 315 Main Street in Fort Worth.

Reservations may be made by calling the Historic Preservation Council at 338-0267. The fee of $5 per person will benefit the Tarrant County Historic Resources Survey.

Showhouse gets magazine's attention

Fort Worth's second annual Designer Showhouse gets eight full pages of color photographs in the January issue of Texas Homes — and provides a fascinating "Oh, that's the way it was" for guests who viewed the Robert P. Dupree home during the holidays.

Mrs. Dupree and her daughters, Kathy and Ellen Dupree, gave a mother-daughter luncheon at home honoring the season's debutantes. The decor of the house has been turned back into what Betty Claire Dupree calls "family traditional."

The formal dining room has been left almost the way Joe Minton and David Corley designed it — with hand-blocked English chintz, used wrong-side out for a more subtle effect, employed both as wall covering and draperies. Mrs. Dupree says she worried first that the chintz was too gaudy — and then that the covering for her own Chippendale chairs wouldn't harmonize with the colors in the chintz. The chairs are upholstered in an orange-toned, rose-cotton chenille — and it works beautifully with the chintz.

The magazine article quotes Minton: "We wanted to downplay the self-conscious grandeur of the owners' Chippendale chairs and Duncan Phyfe table."

Most of the rest of the house has been returned to its more traditional decor. The central foyer of the John Staub-designed home now is carpeted with a pale blue Aubusson rug to match the carpeting on the stairs. The living room, which was designed by Bill Blakeley for the Showhouse with lavender walls, now has pale blue walls. The white slip-covered upholstered pieces, bold contemporary art and brilliant plaid silks as well as the striped contemporary rug are gone.

Walls of the sunroom are still a delicate yellow, but in place of the furniture upholstered with black background fabrics, the Duprees have white wicker furnishings.

Mrs. Dupree told Elna Wilkinson to be sure to go upstairs because Elna's photographs of the Dupree children are once more on the walls.

Of course, all this consideration of before and after of a Designer Showhouse brings up the question of next year. We haven't heard anything definite. One rumor going around is that the Designer Showhouse next year may be a new house, one that no one has lived in. It might make it simpler because the owners wouldn't be forced to vacate.

The Council is also extremely proud of the overwhelming public response to the Showhouse. Judging from the many fine compliments on the beauty, charm, and elegance of the home and the various designers' creations, we feel that it was an event that the people of Fort Worth will long remember.

Due to the revenue generated by this fundraising project the HPC will be able to continue its ongoing efforts toward encouraging historic preservation. Most notably, a major portion of these funds have been dedicated to Phase II of the historic resources survey.

The Council offers its deepest appreciation to Showhouse Chairman Nelda Mills and each member of her small army of volunteers who made it all possible. The Council is also extremely grateful to the interior designers who gave generously of their time and talents to make the Showhouse such a memorable one.

And finally, a most special thanks goes out to Robert and Betty Claire Dupree who made such a great sacrifice in offering their home for the 1982 Showhouse. Surely without their gracious support the project could not have succeeded.

Council Receives $25,000 Grant

The Historic Preservation Council is pleased to announce the receipt of a $25,000 grant from the Amon Carter Foundation. The grant, the largest that the HPC has received to date, will be applied to the Tarrant County historic survey. Our warmest appreciation is extended to the members of the Amon Carter Foundation Board of Directors for this most generous award.

Historic Survey

After two years of planning and many months of hard work, the Historic Preservation Council is pleased to announce that Phase I of its county-wide historic resources survey has been completed. This initial phase included an inventory and professional analysis of the Central Business District of the City of Fort Worth and the City of Grapevine.

The results of the area reports are exciting to say the least. The CBD study listed over 160 structures, approximately sixty of which have been judged eligible for the National Register of Historic Places and another twenty-two which might possibly qualify following restoration and/or further documentation. In addition, the survey delineates eleven possible historic districts or conservation areas within the CBD. The Grapevine survey lists more than sixty structures, fourteen of which appear to qualify for the National Register.

Phase II of Survey Begins

The Council has already begun its second phase of the county-wide survey of historic and architectural resources. A team of surveyors from Charles Hall Page and Associates is already in the field, driving streets and roads, photographing and evaluating the resources in various communities including Mansfield, Azle, Lake Worth, Lakeside, Briar, White Settlement, Keller, Watauga, Colleyville, Southlake, Westlake, Hurst, Euless, and Bedford.

Again, this year's survey is being funded in part by a grant from the Texas Historical Commission as well as proceeds from the 1982 Designers Showhouse. The Council welcomes anyone interested in the history and development of these communities to provide valuable input for the surveyors. Please, contact the Council office (338-0267) if you have information to share that might be of help, most especially information relating to some of the older homes and commercial buildings and other man-made landmarks in these areas.. Marty Craddock is serving as this year's Survey Committee Chairman.

PRESERVATION TAX INCENTIVES

1981 ECONOMIC RECOVERY TAX ACT

Widespread national recognition of the validity of historic preservation prompted the August 13, 1981 approval of the Economic Recovery Tax Act. This legislation, which repealed the Tax Reform Act of 1976, created dramatic changes in the federal tax treatment of historic income producing property undergoing "qualified rehabilitation" performed after December 31, 1981.

A "qualified rehabilitated building" must retain 75% of its existing exterior walls and be income producing. The rehabilitation costs must exceed $5,000 or the adjusted basis of the building, whichever is greater.

"Qualified rehabilitated buildings" other than "certified historic structures" are eligible for the following tax advantages:

if at least 30 years old - 15% Investment Tax Credit (ITC)

- 85% depreciation of allowable rehabilitation expenditures spread over 15 years or, if elected, 35 or 45 years (straightline method only; 60 month rapid amortization has been repealed).

if at least 40 years old - 20% ITC

- 80% depreciation as above

These two levels of tax incentives do not apply to residential properties, nor are they available to certified historic structures. Reviews at the state and federal level are not required for these two incentives.

The highest level of tax incentive is available for a "certified rehabilitation" of a "certified historic structure." A 25% ITC is permitted, as well as 100% depreciation. This incentive is applicable to income producing residential property, which is not owner occupied. This tax incentive applies only to a certified historic structure, and the rehabilitation work must be reviewed by the Texas Historical Commission and approved by the National Park Service Regional Office.

A certified historic structure is a building individually listed in the National Register of Historic Places, or certified to be a contributing member of a National Register Historic District. The contributing status is automatically assumed for all buildings within National Register districts unless certified as non-contributing.

Lessees may also be eligible for these tax benefits provided the remaining term on their lease exceeds 15 years at the time of project completion.

All three levels of tax incentives are also subject to substantial recapture penalties if the property is sold within 5 years of project completion.

Rehabilitation Certification Process

For a historic structure to receive any tax benefits, a Historic Preservation Certification Application must be completed. Part 1 of the application addresses significance. It must be completed for all structures within a National Register District when applying for any tax benefits. This portion is used for the determination of contributing status.

Part 2 of the Application is a description of the rehabilitation work, which should be submitted prior to beginning any rehabilitation work. This allows input from the Historical Commission and the Park Service. An approved application will be issued a preliminary certification by the Park Service, which ensures certification upon project completion provided the work followed the approved application. Final certification is given after the rehabilitation is complete, documentation from the owner is presented, and a possible site visit from the state or federal staff is made. Each area of the building having work done should be documented with photographs of the existing condition, and a written and/or graphic presentation of the proposed work.

The rehabilitation work must conform to the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Rehabilitation, 1979.

Two copies of the completed application and all supporting documentation should be provided. This application is processed by the Texas Historical Commission and is sent to the Regional Office of the National Park Service for a final decision.

Rehabilitation projects begun prior to January 1, 1982 may continue to use the old tax benefits. If those ongoing projects meet the test of substantial rehabilitation for work to be completed after January 1, 1982, those expenditures before January 1 would be carried under the old law, and those expenditures after January 1 would fall under the new law.

Get Involved

There is perhaps no more important issue to the local preservation community than the proposed overhead expansion of the I-30 freeway in downtown Fort Worth. As you may know, a group of concerned individuals have formed a coalition of forces that share a common sense of alarm over the proposed widening of I-30. Appropriately, the organization is named "I CARE" and its purpose is to generate a broad based public input regarding transportation issues that profoundly affect the future of Fort Worth and the quality of life of its citizens.

Anyone wishing to join in this movement and to contribute to the public dialogue on the I-30 and other transportation issues should write "I CARE", P.O. Box 1899, Fort Worth, TX, 76101, c/o Anne Bass or Zelime Ward. Who is to say that your participation might not make a difference?

Volunteer Focus

Although Jane Gudgen sometimes refers to herself jokingly as "just plain Jane," those of us who know her realize that nothing could be farther from the truth. A native of Fort Worth and the wife of local attorney Kenneth Gudgen, Jane has been one of the Council's most dedicated volunteers, serving for the past two years as Ticket Chairman of the HPC's Showhouse Committee. Both in 1981 and again in 1982 she personally shouldered most of the responsibility for advance ticket reservations as well as group ticket sales. Her devotion to the Showhouse project and her generous commitment to the cause of historic preservation deserves the highest recognition of the Council.

Jane not only believes in preservation, she lives it, residing in the beautiful Elizabeth Blvd. Historic District. When she isn't busy being the mother of her two children, Kenneth and Jennie, Jane devotes much of her time to serving the community. She is a member of the Junior League of Fort Worth and an auxiliary of the Edna Gladney Home. Lately she has worked as Publicity Chairman for the home's Community Calendar. In addition she also has served on the Board of the University Christian Church, is an active Tri-Delta alumna, and is a graduate of TCU.

The Preservation Council has been so fortunate to have had such a hard working and supportive ally as Jane Gudgen. And we just wanted to take this opportunity to salute her for all she has done.

Notable Quotes

"The surest expression of a civilization . . . afforded by art is to be found in its architecture, which presents so noble a field for the display of the grand and the beautiful, and which is so intimately connected with the essential comforts and lifestyle of its people."

19th Century American Historian

FIELDER HOUSE

The Fielder House at 1616 West Abram was the showplace of Arlington when it was built in 1914 by James Park Fielder. James Fielder was a successful businessman, philanthropist and farmer. The Fielder family lived in the house until 1951.

When the City of Arlington acquired the house in 1977 in order to construct an overpass and street exchange, a group of concerned citizens became interested in the historic value of the house. The Fielder House Foundation, Inc., was formed and members began raising money to convert the house to a museum. The City of Arlington leased the house to the Foundation, and the project began in earnest. The house received a historical marker from the Texas State Historical Commission in 1979.

The Fielder House is used for many purposes. There are both temporary and permanent exhibits including the J.W. Dunlop collection, the most complete pictorial history of Arlington. Also, there are classes for both children and adults on a variety of subjects.

Since its dedication in 1980, the number of people visiting the museum has increased to 2000. The museum is free and open to the public. For information about current special events, programs or membership in the Fielder House Foundation, call (817)460-4001.

CEMETERY CLEAN-UP

The Tarrant County Historical Commission and the Tarrant County Black Historical and Genealogical Society are coordinating a project to clean up and restore the New Trinity Cemetery near the northeast corner of the intersection of Beach Street and Northeast 28th Street, in Haltom City.

Volunteers are needed to rake, mow, pick up debris and weeds, spread fill dirt using wheelbarrows and shovels, chop down tree sprouts, and straighten grave stones.

Church groups and civic organizations, youth groups and individuals are especially needed to provide the necessary manpower for this effort, and are urged to participate in Saturday work sessions until the job is done.

NEW OFFICE

The Eddleman-McFarland House was purchased by the Fort Worth Junior League in 1978 and is the Junior League's gift of preservation to the city. The Council commends their efforts and is thrilled with its lovely new office in this architectural treasure. Come by on weekdays from 9 to 3 and let Mike or Ann show you around.

The Council has settled into beautiful new office quarters in Fort Worth's Historic Eddleman-McFarland House. From its second floor vantage point with a commanding view of the downtown skyline, the Council's new home, formerly a guest bedroom, is complete with fireplace, built in desk, storage cabinets and a resource center very much in keeping with the quality and meticulously executed renovation of this National Register Landmark.

HISTORIC PRESERVATION:
REINVESTING IN AMERICA'S PAST
Preservation Week ✦ May 9-15, 1982
National Trust for Historic Preservation

An urgent message from the National Trust for Historic Preservation:

"Preservation Week 1982 is no longer business as usual. The elimination of all federal matching grants for the state preservation programs and, for the first time, the National Trust, along with other government actions threaten to undermine the protection of the nation's historic properties. We must use Preservation Week to mobilize the thousands of Americans who belong to organizations like yours. Preservation Week, May 9 to 15, is a time to "raise the roof" on Capitol Hill, to let U.S. Senators and Representatives, the Administration, and the press know that we oppose these threats to our country's heritage."

Please take the time to contact your Congressman and Senator about the proposed elimination of federal funds for historic preservation. Note that the funding for the National Trust in FY 1982 was $2,416,000, and that the budget proposed by the Reagan administration for FY 1983 is $0!

AREA TOURED

At the request of the South Side Area Chamber of Commerce, The Historic Preservation Council was able to help with the Chamber's 100th Anniversary celebration by forming a Task Force to research, write and conduct a tour of the South Side. On March 27, three busloads, left Central Bank and Trust for the opening of Hemphill and a one and a half hour tour.

Susie Pritchett organized and wrote the tour within six weeks. She worked closely with Norm Robbins and Jeannie Hale with the Fort Worth Chamber and Alan Teichelman of Central Bank and Trust. The task force, composed of representatives from the American Institute of Architects, Fort Worth Chapter; Berkeley Place Association; Fairmount Association; Mistletoe Heights Association; Ryan Place Improvement; Texas Heritage, Inc. and University West Association provided their knowledge and expertise. Members of the Task Force included Bob Adams, Francis Allen, Marty Craddock, Wanetta Ezell, Joan Kline, Margaret Morgan, Susie Pritchett, Bill Pruett, Carol Roark, Ann J. Smith and Deborah Phelan.

The tour included well known landmarks of the South Side such as Chase Court, Modern Drug, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Elizabeth Boulvard, Mistletoe Drive, Thistle Hill and the Women's Club complex. Participants were treated to some lesser known sites such as the trade tree at 11th and Cooper which according to legend was the original site of the first trading between the white man and the Indians in 1843, as well as a view of the Laneri home surrently under restoration, and one of the last remaining Queen Anne homes on the South Side at 712 May.

The Georgian home on the bluff overlooking the Trinity was built by John F. Staub in 1928 for John P. King and his wife Lorene. Later the home was purchased by Mr. William McFadden. Fifteen years ago the Duprees purchased the home.

Nelda Mills, 1982 Designer Showhouse Chairman is forming committees for the Showhouse and she is seeking volunteers. Call the Council office at 338-0267 if you wish to volunteer for a position.

A new feature this year will be a tea room on the Showhouse grounds which will be organized and operated by the Junior League of Fort Worth.

GRANTS WORKSHOP

The Texas Historical Commission will sponsor a grant writing workshop in Fort Worth on July 14-15. The training course in corporate and foundation fund raising will be taught by Don Umlah of Arizona State University and Anice Read of the Texas Historical Commission, both of whom have excellent established track records in grants writing and fund raising. Anyone interested in wishing to attend should contact Mike Collins, 338-0267, for an application and further information, or contact the Texas Historical Commission, P.O. Box 12276, Austin, Texas, 78711, (512)475-3092.

VOLUNTEER PROFILE

If every community in Texas had a dedicated preservationist with the skills and commitment of Dee (Mrs. Jesse H.) Barker, preservation efforts throughout the state would be remarkable.

Dee is a native of the historic Atlanta, Georgia area and a resident of Colleyville, Texas since the 1960's. In the 1970's she became actively involved in local historical organizations, such as the Northeast Historical Society, which was organized to research and appreciate the history of northeastern Tarrant County. She also became a leader in the Grapevine Historical Society, and spearheaded that organization's successful restoration of the Torian Log Cabin which is located in Grapevine's town square. Her research on authenticity, restoration techniques, and her commonsense approach to the challenges of preservation continued into subsequent projects.

In 1977 Dee Barker was appointed to the Tarrant County Historical Commission, and has been serving the Commission as a liaison person ever since. Dee has initiated dozens of communications with county organizations and individuals on preservation matters. Examples are her relationships with staff persons in Fort Worth's Planning Department, Tarrant County Legal Department, and the North Texas Council of Governments. In advisory capacity, she has graciously responded to numerous requests from Tarrant County Historical Commission Chairman Duane Gage to conduct short-term studies and launch inquiries that have greatly aided the Commission in its program of work.

Dee Barker has spent a great deal of time studying copies of bylaws of various organizations, and has coordinated revisions of bylaws and standing rules for several groups so that they would function more smoothly.

Dee Barker was the Commission's first official representative to the HPCFTC, first serving on its Advisory Board. She also served on the Council's committee to select the first Executive Director and she actively participated in the interviewing and selection of the director, a process which took several weeks for conducting interviews and evaluating credentials. Her professional experience in personal work made her contributions to this matter especially important.

Serving on the Council's Survey Committee, Dee researched bibliographies on literature relating to historical surveys, ordered voluminous data, and corresponded with several firms and individuals for information about appropriate procedures for conducting an historical survey. Her expertise in personnel work also made her participating in preliminary interviewing of representatives of professional firms for the survey project of great value. Then, when the survey actually got under way, she conducted the required historical research on Grapevine's survey practically single-handed. Her liaison with Grapevine's Convention and Visitor's Bureau made the Grapevine survey possible.

Dee's husband, Jesse H. Barker, is an instructor with Bell Helicopter Textron. Her daughter, Kathy, is working on her Doctorate in Anthropology at the University of Arizona, Tuscon. Her son David, a graduate of Texas A & M, is a petroleum engineer.

H-C ORDINANCE

In the spring of 1979 several people quite separately and independently began the preparation of proposed historical preservation ordinances for the City of Fort Worth. Stan Baker completed his draft proposal and forwarded it to the Development Department of the City. Gene Brooks sent his proposal to the Planning Department. Gary Havard presented his proposal both orally and in writing to the Zoning Task Force.

The Zoning Task Force had been appointed by the City Council to improve and rewrite the City's Historical-Cultural Zoning Ordinance. It was the proposals submitted by these three architects that formed the basis for the proposal that was to go forward from the Zoning Task Force to the City Staff, the Zoning Commission and finally, the City Council.

A new Historical-Cultural Ordinance was approved unanimously by the City Council in early December of last year. The ordinance calls for the City Council to appoint an Historical-Cultural Advisory Board to implement the ordinance.

The Fort Worth City Council recently appointed five people to this newly created board; Joe King, a former city planner; John Mason, a planner with the architectural firm of Carter and Burgess; Gary Havard with North Fort Worth Historical Society; KAthy Livingston, an architectural historian with Komatsu and Associates; and Bill Pruett with Lawrence D. White and Associates.

THC PRESERVATION CONFERENCE

The Texas Historical Commission held its annual statewide preservation conference in Brenham, April 15-17. Preservationists from throughout Texas were in attendance to share ideas and benefit from a series of sessions covering a wide range of topics relating to historic preservation. Mike Collins represented the Historic Preservation Council. Tarrant County was well represented also by a delegation of Tarrant County Historical Commission members.

On Thursday evening Chairman Duane Gage and Larry Landis of the TCHC spoke on the Commission's recent success with the marriage license project. But the highlight of the proceedings came Saturday at the awards luncheon as the Tarrant County Historical Commission was presented with the award for most Outstanding County Historical Commission. Capturing individual awards from the TCHC were Mike Patterson for Outstanding Commission Member and Ruby Schmidt for Outstanding Committee Chairman, both being well deserved honors.

Our congratulations to Mike, Ruby, Duane, and all the members of the Commission! We are extremely proud of their accomplishments and the recognition they brought to Tarrant County.

The theme of the state preservation conference was "The Past Never Grows Old." During the three-day meeting there were several sessions dealing with a wide range of topics relating to historic preservation and featuring speakers from throughout the state.

EDUCATION GOALS SET

The HPCFTC Education Committee has identified three projects it hopes to complete by May 1982. The Committee members include Deborah Phelan, Chairman; Frances Allen, Ann Bastable, Mike Collins, Marty Craddock, Monette Fugate, Duane Gage, Frank Goss, Gary Havard, Jean Kelly, Joan Kline, Mary Rankin, Lenora Rolla, Kathy Rosenthal and Linda Smith.

In conjunction with National Historic Preservation Week, May 9-16, the Education Committee is investigating the possibility of placing flyers emphasizing the theme, "Reinvesting in America's Past" in various Tarrant County Banks. The Committee would also like to coordinate a Historic Saturday during the month of May to encourage Tarrant County groups to hold a special "preservation" activity in honor of National Historic Preservation Week. The third project the Education Committee is pursuing is the publication of a brochure listing the historic sites and/or activities in Tarrant County. The brochure would include information on times, dates, reservations, size and age limitations as well as a brief paragraph on the historical significance. Funding will have to be sought after the Education Committee completes its research.

Anyone interested in contributing to the Education Committee's effort should contact Deborah Phelan at 336-2100 or 738-3488.

SHOWHOUSE BIG SUCCESS

The HPC's 1981 Designer's Showhouse was nothing short of a spectacular success. Approximately 1200 volunteers gave their time and support to make this event both a civic and financial success. Over 4400 visitors toured the Showhouse, located at 1302 Elizabeth Boulevard, last October. And the Council netted $25,699.42 as a result of ticket sales, program advertisements, and donations. A special thanks to Dr. John Jeffers and his wife Sarah who made it all possible, Paula Brittain, 1981 Showhouse Chairman who worked tirelessly to bring the project to fruition and to all the troops (all 1200 of them) who volunteered their time and resources to help make the Showhouse a reality. We only hope that the 1982 Showhouse will be equally successful, but it will be a tough act to follow.

SURVEY UPDATE

Surveyors from Charles Hall Page and Associates, Architecture and Urban Planning firm based in San Francisco, completed their field survey of the Central Business District of Fort Worth and the City of Grapevine last October. At present the council's Survey Committee is busily at work gathering historical background information on the 165 structures in the CBD and the 63 in Grapevine that the surveyors identified foe further study and evaluation.

During the past two months volunteer researchers for the council have been searching through local tax records and other government documents, papers in the possession of the Tarrant County Historical Commission, public library materials, area newspapers, photograhic collections and old survey maps to shed some light on the past of these historic buildings.

The Council would also like to acknowledge County Judge Mike Moncrief and Tax Assessor Reed Stewart for making it possible for us to copy pertinent tax records at no cost.

Anyone wishing to participate in the survey research, or anyone willing to share information, please call Mike Collins, 338-0267.

NEW DIRECTOR

On October 28, 1981, Mike Collins assumed the position of Director of the Historic Preservation Council. A native of Fort Worth, Mike received his M.A. and B.A. degrees from TCU. For the past four years he has been an instructor of American history at Brookhaven College and TWU.

Congratulations and best wishes to Deborah Phelan, former Director of the Council, in her new position as Director of Public Relations at Medical Plaza Hospital.

1982 SHOWHOUSE

The Historic Preservation Council is pleased to announce the appointment of Nelda Mills as Chairman of the 1982 Designer's Showhouse. The wife of Mrs. H. Gray Mills and the mother of two children, she is an extremely dedicated and hard-working individual who provided invaluable assistance to Paula Brittain and also worked closely with the Jeffers during the planning and implementation of the '81 Showhouse.

Her interest in historic preservation was awakened when she and her family lived near Williamsburg, Virginia, fifteen years ago. It was rekindled in recent years during a visit to Boston and New England, a visit which she informs us has been repeated several times since.

Nelda is now in the process of filling volunteer positions for the '82 Showhouse scheduled for October. She needs many people in a number of different areas, including at-the-door ticket positions. Those knowledgeable about the survey could be extremely helpful here since visitors'inquiries on this subject were frequent last October. Another area of need is in the day chairmen positions.

If you wish to volunteer for any of these positions, or if you have any other particular expertise to offer, or if you have any suggestions concerning a prospective house for this year's project, please contact Nelda, 732-5790.

ON PRESERVATION

"The preservation of historic sites for the public benefit, together with their proper interpretation, tend to enhance the respect and love of the citizen for the institutions of this country, as well as strengthen his resolution to uphold the hallowed traditions and high ideals of America."

Franklin Delano Roosevelt
32nd President of the United States

Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County, Texas

Dear Friends,

The Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County is pleased to announce its 1982 Designer Showhouse, which will be held October 9-17 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Dupree, 4926 Crestline Road. The success of any project of this magnitude can be ensured only through generous participation of a concerned community. We are asking for your support at this time in the form of a donation, which will help underwrite this Showhouse.

Showhouse profits last year were approximately $25,000.00. Proceeds from this year's Showhouse will again benefit the Historic Preservation Council's historic resources survey of Tarrant County. This is a project which will identify significant structures built prior to 1945. The resulting data will provide useful information as our community plans urban redevelopment strategies for both inner-city neighborhoods and commercial areas. Our private sector will benefit from the identification of properties eligible for tax advantages and incentives. The nationally recognized San Francisco firm of Charles Hall Page and Associates, Inc. has been retained to conduct this survey at a cost in excess of $250,000.

The response to our initial effort in the fall of 1981 was overwhelming. Generous donations of time, goods and services for this year's Showhouse have been even more outstanding, indicating this is truly an event Tarrant County is eager to embrace. We hope you too will choose to be a part of this special occasion. Please join us as we strive to make our past an important part of our future.

Designers Showhouse A Success

The 1982 Designers Showhouse was a tremendous financial and social success. Between October 9 and October 17 more than 5,100 people (700 more than last year) toured the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Dupree, 4926 Crestline. Moreover, the Council netted an estimated $36,000 from ticket sales, advertisements, individual and corporate donations, as well as a percentage of the receipts from the Landmark Tearoom which was operated by the Junior League of Fort Worth. The Council is also extremely proud of the overwhelming public response to the Showhouse. Judging from the many fine compliments on the beauty, charm, and elegance of the home and the various designers' creations, we feel that it was an event that the people of Fort Worth will long remember.

The Commission mails the licenses, which are rich in artistic design, to the first descendant or relative who requests available ones on condition that the request is submitted in writing and includes a stamped, self-addressed envelope. A contribution is requested to help with Commission expenses.

Requests should include the names of the groom and bride, approximate date of marriage, and a return envelope, mailed to Tarrant County Historical Commission, P.O. Box 18331, Fort Worth, Tx. 76118.

FW genealogy buff fills gap in his family tree

By GEORGE WYSATTA
Fort Worth Bureau

FORT WORTH — Because his grandparents declined to travel 15 miles 94 years ago and folks at the Tarrant County courthouse cleaned house last fall, genealogy buff Jack Melear has filled a gap in the family tree.

Fort Worth resident Melear had traced his family back to the early days of Texas statehood in Jasper County. He knew his grandparents were married in the 1870s or 1880s in the area of Johnson Station in Tarrant County, near the present site of Arlington.

From Tarrant County officials he obtained a photostat of the marriage license of his paternal grandparents but couldn't come up with one for his mother's parents.

Then he got a break.

During rennovation of the courthouse last fall, six files of old marriage licenses turned up, dated from 1876 to 1931. County Clerk Madrin Huffman gave them to the Tarrant County Historical Commission for distribution to relatives who want a family heirloom.

Among 50,000 marriage certificates, Melear found the one he wanted: for J.A. Witherington and Ada Crocker, Oct. 31, 1887. He also got the original of his copy of the 1878 license issued to his paternal grandparents, Z.T. Melear and J.C. Jopling.

Commission offers marriage licenses

Unclaimed marriage licenses filed in Tarrant County between 1876 and 1932 may be obtained by contacting the Tarrant County Historical Commission, part of an on-going project sponsored by the organization.

Duane Gage, commission chairman, said so far some 500 inquiries about certificates have been received and some 400 licenses have been distributed to relatives and descendants of couples married during this time period who failed to receive their licenses.

The documents are "rich in artistic design," he said.

Gage said marriage licenses are mailed to the first descendant or relative requesting available copies.

Requests should include names of the bride and groom, approximate marriage date and should be mailed to the Tarrant County Historical Commission, P.O. Box 18331, Fort Worth, Tex. 76118.

A stamped self-addressed envelope should be included. The commission is requesting donations to help defray expenses.

About 400 marriage certificates from 1876 to 1932 have been distributed to relatives and descendants of the couples who were married in Tarrant County but failed to claim their licenses.

The Tarrant County Historical Commission has received about 500 inquiries about the unclaimed marriage licenses.

Requests must be submitted in writing and include a stamped, self-addressed envelope. A contribution to the commission would be appreciated, commission chairman Duane Gage said.

Requests also should include the names of the groom and bride and the approximate date of the marriage. Mail to the Tarrant County Historical Commission, Box 18331, Fort Worth 76118.

Festive (and costly) dining

CISSY

We seem to making progress on the complaint that most Fort Worth benefit tickets are $100 each. Tickets now seem to be more than $100 — if that is progress. At any rate, invitations are out for a Renaissance Feast and Benefit Performance of Shakespeare in the Park Inc., and tickets are $125 each — fully tax-deductible because Budweiser is picking up the entire tab. The "festive dining, Shakespearean verse, Renaissance music and dance" are scheduled for Trinity Park Playhouse at 7 p.m. Tuesday, June 15. In case of rain, festive dining, etc. will be at the same hour on June 22 — exactly a week later. Mrs. Charles L. Geren is reservations chairman.

New in 'Who's Who'

Race-car driver Rick Mears came in second this weekend at Indianapolis, but he is one of the new listees in the 1982-83 Who's Who. Forty-six others from this area are listed in the publication for the first time, including Richard Edward Adams, David Owen Belew Jr., Stephen Richard Boma, Lorenzo Otis Brightbill III, Edward Blake Byrne, Gaylan Jane Collier, Russell Hooper Dilday Jr., Dennis Alexander Dillard, Harold John Elias, Jon Hugh Fleming, Edward Earl Hatchett, Harold Edward Jervey Jr., Webb Francis Joiner, George Frank Leone, Eddie Monroe Lesok, Robert Reed Lynn, Edwin Wayne Mercer, William Henderson Michero, Jan Keene Muhlert, Walter Edward Mullendore, George Raymond Nugent, Donald R. Otto, Adlai McMillan Pate Jr., Warren Potash, John V. Roach, David Michael Ryan, Marion Jack Suggs, Charles William Tindall Jr., Jackson Bennett Tinsley, Loyd Leonard Turner, Durward Earl Wilson, John A. Wilson and Herschel Clyde Winn, all of Fort Worth.

Those in Who's Who for the first time from Arlington are Irving Owen Dawson, James Richard Erickson, Steven Robert Kent, David Yeong-Suei Lou,, Albert Oliver Jr., Fred Lee Phillips, John Wilson Rouse Jr., Gladstone Taylor Stevens Jr., Richard Brendan Timmons and George Smith Wright.

Other new listees are Joseph McCright Hill of Cleburne, Peter Michael Finn of D/FW Airport, and Hugh Henry Scheurer of Carrollton. Former Lt. Gov. Ben Barnes of Brownwood also is listed for the first time in the coming edition.

City birthday party

The annual meeting of Tarrant County Historical Society at 6 p.m. Sunday at Colonial Country Club will celebrate the 133rd birthday of Fort Worth — and it probably doesn't feel a day over 80. Texas historian and author J. Everetts Haley will be speaker. After Haley's talk, Dallas musical group Tinker's Dam will play.

Dr. Edwin G. Troutman, president of the society, says non-members are welcome and may make reservations by sending checks for $20 each to the Tarrant County Historical Society Inc., Fort Worth, 76104. Members and guests may make reservations with Mrs. Cricket McCluer, 731-1837, or with Dr. Troutman, 336-9881.

Collector's items

Meanwhile, the Tarrant County Historical Commission — that's different from the Tarrant County Historical Society — has distributed about 400 marriage licenses to relatives and descendants of couples who married between 1876 and 1932 and failed to receive their certified marriage license. The commission's rule is that the marriage license, a collectible item because of the ornate design, is mailed to the first descendant or relative who makes a request. Provide a request in writing and include a stamped self-addressed envelope. A contribution to the commission is requested to help with expenses. Additional information may be obtained by writing the commission at P.O. Box 18331, Fort Worth 76118.

The commission, an appointed county agency with the statutory responsibility of initiating and conducting programs to preserve the community's heritage, is accepting donations of old photographs, manuscripts, small artifacts and memorabilia for use in a special archives room that will be located in the restored Tarrant County Courthouse near the building's south entrance on the main floor. Gifts of display cases with locks, bookcases and framed wall displays also are being sought according to Duane Gage, commission chairman.

Mrs. J.J. Ballard Jr. is chairman of the special committee to furnish the archives room. She asks that individuals with items to donate contact her at 732-0396. When the courthouse reopens in 1983, the archives room will house a collection of basic reference material for historical research. Researchers also will be able to have public records brought to the room.

Corps scientist preserves history

By Pat Gordon
Mid-Cities Bureau of The News

GRAPEVINE — Construction halted on the Warm Springs dam near San Francisco while Larry Banks, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' first archaeologist, reviewed reports and located unexplored Indian sites. The Corps of Engineers depended on his testimony as an expert witness to end the lawsuit which had interrupted its building.

But after a week of study, Banks saw more than construction stopping. He saw his dream career washing away.

"It was a traumatic experience," Banks recalled, sitting in the Corps project office at Lake Grapevine. "At the end of the first week, I was really frustrated. If I testified truthfully, it would be against the Corps and the National Park Service. They hadn't done their job right and I had to sit there and tell them that."

And he did.

No one lost, however. The judge ruled the dam construction could continue, if Banks' recommendations on the archaeological discoveries were carried out. Banks went on to Washington to help write archaeological guidelines for the Corps' expanding department and later became head of archaeologists for the Corps' Southwest district and a consultant for other districts.

Archaeologist helps preserve history

The California lawsuit was only the beginning. At one time, Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas described the Army's construction unit as "Public Enemy No. 1" and the Corps became a favorite target for environmental groups, whose "concern was well founded," Banks said. With passage of the National Environmental Protection Act of 1970, "every project became a potential lawsuit," the 43-year-old Hurst resident recalled.

"I was always skirting anticipated litigation," he said.

Lawsuits weren't exactly what Banks planned to uncover as the Corps' only archaeologist. Investigating ancient Indian sites before they were lost under a new lake or destroyed by construction work was his aim, one he finally realized when the Corps received funds for other archaeologists in 1974.

As a kid growing up in Grapevine, Banks prowled the countryside looking for Indian artifacts. A triangular-shaped dart point became his first of many finds in the area.

After graduating from high school, he headed for West Texas State University and a major in a practical field, geology, even though his first choice as a career was archaeology.

"In 1957, there were 300 archaeologists in the United States. There were no jobs. It was a dead-end field," Banks recalled. "So, even though I was interested in archaeology, I chose geology for practical reasons."

Banks graduated from the university and joined the Navy as a candidate for officer training. Disillusioned with OCS, he and 30 others dropped out and were shipped to a boot camp in Illinois. When other recruits discovered he was from Texas and had worked on an Amarillo ranch, they became convinced he was a friend of Vice President Lyndon Johnson.

"They wanted me to write Lyndon Johnson and ask him to get us on the USS Enterprise's (first nuclear aircraft carrier) maiden voyage," Banks recalled. "Finally, I said if they would pay for the call, I'd call him. I called information in Washington and got his home number. I called him one Sunday night and couldn't believe it when he answered the phone. I said, 'I'm Larry Banks from Grapevine' and told him that we wanted on the Enterprise. He said, 'I can't make any promises, but send me your names and service numbers.' "

The men sent Johnson the information, but shortly afterwards they received orders to a variety of ships. However, before shipping out, new orders came through assigning all 31 to the USS Enterprise, where Banks spent his remaining 18 months in the Navy.

After being discharged, Banks went to work in the Houston oilfields, which he left to work on a master's degree in history. Before completing the degree, he went to work for the Corps of Engineers in 1965 as a material technician and concrete inspector.

Banks spent most of his early years with the Corps in Oklahoma, where he worked on geology-related projects. In his spare time, though, he spent exploring and cataloging Indian campsites. In 1970, the Tulsa district became the first Corps office to hire its own archaeologist — Banks.

While battling lawsuits and trying to salvage Indian sites, Banks also researched flint quarries for the Smithsonian Institution. He recently completed nearly 10 years of work, which involved taking flint samples from Indian sites and tracing the samples to their original quarries scattered across the Great Plains.

In 1976, Banks came back to Texas as archaeologist for the Corps' Southwest district where he now has 12 archaeologists working under him. The district currently is planning 89 projects and has 30 under way, he said. Although his job is mainly administrative, unless a problem occurs, he does get involved in "pet" projects, such as the dinosaur tracks discovered at Lake Grapevine.

"I've loved archaeology since I was a kid," said Banks, who also finds time to write poetry, play chess and collect fossils. "I feel fortunate to be able to work at something I like so much."

Indians leave relics

By the time most of the Anglo-American settlers began moving into what is today northeast Tarrant County, the Indians who had lived here for thousands of years were virtually gone.

Most of those seen and felt by early settlers here were nomads who came into the area to hunt or raid. Every old-timer who grew up along Big Bear Creek and Little Bear Creek in the present Euless-Grapevine-Colleyville-Keller-Southlake area knew the Indians were here because of the abundant artifacts they left behind.

Artifact hunters here have been building collections for years, but until now few trained archeologists have taken a close look at the many Indian sites in the area. That is a bout to change. University of Texas graduate student Dan Prikryl of Austin will be spending most of his weekends for the next year in this area surveying and mapping places along both Big and Little Bear Creeks where Indians are known to have lived.

Larry Banks, a Grapevine native and present archeologist for the U.S. Corps of Engineers and a Research Associate at the Smithsonian Institution, says that some sites in Grapevine have already yielded artifacts more than 7,500 years old.

Prikryl, who has completed several seasons of archeological excavations with the Smithsonian Institution and several universities has already begun to study sites along Big Bear Creek in the Minters Chapel area. He is eager to meet with an talk to land owners along the creek to gain permission to survey their properties as.

A public meeting, sponsored by the Tarrant County Archeological Society and the Tarrant County Historical Commission, will be held in Grapevine Thursday, July 15 at 7:30 p.m. in the Community Room of the Grapevine Police/Library complex, 307 Dallas Road The meeting will include a slide presentation and brief discussion of what is know about the archeology of the area. Banks and Prikryl will be on hand to answer questions.

During the greater part of the last 150 years, many isolated artifacts and even entire archeological sites were encountered by farmers and other local residents who left oral or written evidence of what they found, but in most cases the items, such as arrowheads, knives and scrapers, were simply considered curiousities which have been handed down in families who still know where the original locations, were. Those locations, to a large extent, have since been destroyed through land use changes. In order to obtain as complete a record as possible of the past cultures who have lived here, the information known to local residents needs to be compiled to gai the maximum benefit from it.

Individuals who would like to know more about the artifacts they have found are encouraged to bring them to the meeting to be identified and to allow the archeologists to use that information in attempting to add to The historical and archeological knowledge of the area.

Interested persons of all ages are invited to attend the meeting. Later meetings are also being planned in other locations as the project continues.

Indian artifact study begins in Mid-Cities

Indian artifacts found in Northeast Tarrant County for years have been passed from one generation to another, but seldom to trained archaeologists.

Dan Prikryl, a University of Texas in Austin graduate student, has begun studying sites along Big Bear Creek in the Minters Chapel area.

Last week he talked with landowners and others at a meeting sponsored jointly by the Tarrant County Historical Commission and Tarrant County Archaeological Society.

Some 35 persons attended the meeting, and 200-300 artifacts also showed up, said Mike Patterson, a historical commission committee chairman.

"Most of the things found in this part of Tarrant Count are from between 11500 B.C. and 500 A.D.," Patterson said. "By the time the Anglos arrived here, most of the sedentary Indians were gone."

The Comanches, of course, still were living in the area and caused problems for early settlers.

Patterson said Prikryl is just beginning his study, starting with topographical maps revealing land features of an area and then walking over the land itself.

Patterson has accompanied Prikryl on a few trips, he said, noting students usually can tell from the map which areas likely will have concentrations of the Indian artifacts.

"We've found quite a few things on just the surface of the ground," Patterson said. Later in the study return trips are planned — with shovels.

Manpower is needed now.

"I think he enlisted quite a few people," Patterson said. "All the peole who were there were real supportive."

Prikyl plans to work weekends in the area for the next year.

Others who want to help Prikryl can call him at 334-2095.

Larry Banks, a Grapevine native, archaeologist for the U.S. Corps of Engineers and a research associate at the Smithsonian Institution, says some sites in Grapevine already have yielded artifacts more than 7,500 years old.

Several valuable locations also have been destroyed by development and others are in danger, he said.

Making tracks for science

By DOMINGO RAMIREZ
Star-Telegram Writer

GRAPEVINE—Torrential rains last November may have been a hardship for area residents, but four months later they are proving a boon for local geologists.

The heavy rains are being credited by geologists from Southern Methodist University with uncovering the first dinosaur tracks ever found in Tarrant County.

The six tracks, made about 80 million years ago by a hadrosaur (a duckbilled dinosaur), were removed Thursday from a spillway on northern Grapevine Lake.

The tracks, the only ones of their kind ever found in the state, were excavated here Thursday and taken to the Dallas Museum of Natural History.

A second set of tracks, less than 100 yards from the first group, are also believed to have been made by a duckbilled dinosaur. Those will be excavated in the next few days.

And geologists say the spillway area may be filled with more findings scientists could use to determine the type of animals that lived in North Texas millions of years ago.

"The flood was a catastrophe to the public, but it has uncovered benefits," said David Gillette, one of the team members from SMU who headed the excavation. "It's a once-in-a-lifetime incident."

The tracks, each approximately 1½ feet long, were found March 14 by Charlie and Julie Tyler of Farmers Branch. Mrs. Tyler is a geology student at Brookhaven College in Dallas.

"We had heard about how waters had gouged out a deep area around here, so we came down that Sunday looking for fossils," she said. "He (Charlie) saw the tracks first. We thought someone else had already reported it because we didn't think we were the first to see it."

"We were skeptical at first, but as soon as we saw the tracks, we knew they were made by a dinosaur," said Gillette, a curator of SMU's Shuler Museum of Paleontology.

Hadrosaurs were 12 to 15 feet tall, walked on two legs and weighed from 3 to 9 tons. They had webbed, three-toed feet and spent most of their time in delta areas.

The ages meet when helicopter lifts dino prints

By T.G. SPEARS
Staff Writer

Back, back in time to a younger earth ... to a primal lagoon on the shore of the cretacious sea, 90 million years ago.

Back to the time when a great creature rose from the lagoon, water shimmering down its long back, silt pouring from its broad, duck-like mouth as rows of peg-like teeth slowly ground leaves from soft, aquatic plants. Then, blinking its reptilian eyes, it waded slowly on. And beneath the surface, beneath the weight of three tons, its broad, flat feet pressed their image into the sand, signatures in time of a world 150 million lifetimes into the past.

Thursday, the now hard-rock bed of that long-ago lagoon once again thundered with movement, not from great living creatures but from beating rotors as a helicopter lifted the prehistoric prints out of the canyon created in the spillway overflow from Grapevine Lake last fall.

A crowd of 150 watched as crews connected the first of the 500-pound, plaster-encased prints out of the canyon and transported it to a nearby truck.

The lift operation took approximately half an hour to move the last four of several prints discovered March 14 by Charlie and Julie Tyler, an area couple browsing for fossils in the spillway gorge.

Following the airlift, the prints were carried by truck to the Dallas Museum of Natural History in Fair Park for display later this year.

Chuck Finsley, curator of earth sciences at the museum, said the prints will have worldwide significance to the field of paleontology.

"This is as good as you can get," he told reporters Thursday. "We'll be hearing alot about this find in the future."

Finsley said the Grapevine find may be included in paleontology textbooks and scientific journals throughout the world.

The tracks were made by a hadrosaur, an amphibious, duck-billed dinosaur that inhabited lagoons and deltas on the edges of prehistoric seas.

Hadrosaur is a family classification consisting of several species of duck-billed dinosaurs. Finsley said no species determination could be made on the Grapevine dinosaur at this time.

Hadrosaurs are particularly interesting to paleontologists for several reasons.

Some hadrosaur skulls are honeycombed by sinus cavities or have unusual projections, the functions of which remain a mystery to paleontologists.

Finsley said a recent hadrosaur find consisted of a nest of young hadrosaurs which posed new questions for researchers. Because the young dinosaurs were larger than hatchling size, yet had remained within the nest for some time after hatching, the find has prompted the supposition that adult hadrosaurs may have actually provided parental care to their young, a behavior uncharacteristic of dinosaurs or modern reptiles.

Hadrosaur finds in North America range from Texas to Canada because of the rising and receding action of prehistoric oceans.

Finsley said he believes a shoreline as far north as Dallas may have existed at the time the Grapevine hadrosaur lived. A series of breaker islands may have lined the coast, and the Grapevine area was most probably a lagoon or swamp, as indicated by the geological strata at the find.

The airlift operation to remove the prints was a cooperative effort between the museum, Southern Methodist University, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers which controls the federally-owned lake area and Vought Aircraft Corporation which provided the helicopter service.

The prints were encased in a plaster-burlap matrix to prevent crumbling during the removal operation. A metal sheet, driven beneath the prints, allowed them to be lifted with little risk of damage.

Further research on the prints will be conducted by Southern Methodist University's geology department, under the direction of Dr. David Gillette, curator of the Shuler Museum of Paleontology, located at the university.

It was Gillette's department that rendered the preliminary determination that the prints were left by a hadrosaur.

"At first, we were skeptical that these were dinosaur tracks because such fossils have not been found in rocks in this area," Gillette said. "However, as soon as we saw the tracks, we knew they were made by a hadrosaur."

Of particular scientific significance, the find included the only known prints made by hadrosaur forefeet. The forelegs were small and thought to have been weak, limiting their use in supporting the animal.

The forefeet prints indicate that hadrosaurs did occasionally make use of their forelegs for support, most probably when feeding on low-lying vegetation.

Gillette said further research on the prints would be directed toward identification of the Grapevine dinosaur's species, and determining more information about the individual's size based on foot size and stride length.

Gillette currently estimates the creature to have been from 15 to 20 feet in height and weighing two to three tons.

Gillette said he hopes the find will "turn-on" the local population to the sciences.

"By far, the greatest benefits will be the enhancement to the status of museum activity in the area and in the area of public education once the prints are on display," he said.

Gillette said he hopes area residents will appreciate the signifcance of the find and of continuing scientific research into the earth's past.

Texas has contributed a number of dinosaur finds in recent years, and the northeastern area of the state in particular has yielded a number of discoveries.

Gillette praised the cooperative effort between SMU, the Dallas museum and the Corps, calling the operation "splendid."

20,000-year-old tooth leads to ancient trove

Grapevine has once again provided science with keys to the earth's distant past.

Last fall, the spillway washout revealed a set of dinosaur prints which were airlifted from the arroyo in April, and are now on display at the Dallas Museum of Natural History.

And last week, scientists were once again at work in Grapevine soil, this time, removing the bones of a 15-foot, 4-ton imperial mammoth, the shaggy predecessor of modern elephants which proliferated across the earth from 8,000 to 50,000 years ago.

The discovery of the bones is credited to Jimmy Conover, a highway department employee. Conover spotted one of the creature's massive teeth protruding from the soil of a creekbed north of the airport. Conover was mowing the grass in the area when he made the discovery.

Conover contacted anthropologist Jan H. Moorman, a long-time friend.

"I couldn't imagine what kind of animal the tooth came from, from how he described the tooth to me," Moorman said.

Conover described the tooth as being broad and flat and very wide.

"From the way he described it, I thought I was looking for a herbivorous animal, probably from the cretaceous period," Moorman said.

The cretaceous period lasted from 65 to 135 million years ago, and was the last period in which the dinosaurs flourished.

Moorman accompanied Conover to the site. The tooth, which still bore its enamel covering, measured eight centimeters across, roughly four inches.

Moorman excavated the tooth and then contacted Southern Methodist University who referred her to the Dallas Museum of Natural History.

Further excavation of the sight revealed not only more teeth but the creature's massive jaw as well, containing the remnant stump of the huge, curling tusk so characteristic of the mammoths.

Later excavations in the stream bed also revealed a tooth from a prehistoric horse, and another bone from an unidentified animal a few yards from the mammoth bones.

The mammoth bones have been identified as those of mammuthus imperator, the imperial mammoth, the largest of the genus and native to North America.

See MAMMOTH, Page 4A

Mammoth

Imperial mammoth finds are not unusual in Texas, and scientists believe the great animals were numerous in the state during the mid-pleistocene period, from 8,000 to 50,000 years ago.

While the northern and southern regions of the planet were smothered by massive glaciers and year-round sub-freezing temperatures, the more temporate middle zones of the earth yielded great prairies of grass, the primary food source for the animals.

The great mammoths moved in herds, accompanied by prehistoric horses, camels, sloths and other creatures in a zoological scenario similar to the modern grasslands of southern Africa.

For this reason, it's common to find the remains of several animals in the vicinity of mammoth fossils, said paleontologist Chuck Finsley, a staff member of the Dallas museum.

Finsley worked on the mammoth excavations last week and was also a member of the team which excavated the Grapeine dinosaur prints.

Finsley explained that the mammoths often followed streams and rivers during their migrations, and as a result, when they died, their bones were often washed downstream.

"The bones of the mammoths were so large, that they often served as natural dams," Finsley said.

The remains of other animals which often followed the mammoth herds were also washed downstream and then trapped in the lakes resulting from the dams formed by the mammoth skeletons.

Among the bones commonly found in such sites are those of prehistoric beavers which dwelled in those lakes. Those beavers commonly reached lengths of four feet.

The mammoth's numbers expanded throughout northern regions of the planet, to whatever areas could be reached by land bridges existing during the great ice ages.

The mammoths were so successful, in fact, that their massive silhouettes with long, curved tusks have become virtually a symbol of the great ice ages.

But after nearly 40,000 years of domination, the great herds of mammoths disappeared rather suddenly in the relative measurement of time.

Why?

During those great ice ages, another animal was rising to dominance — that animal, was man.

Although the cause of mammoth extinction remains controversial among scientists, most agree that organized hunting by mankind contributed greatly to their disappearance.

See FIND, Page 5A

The earliest authenticated signs of tribal man in North America date back to 15,000 B.C. The mammoths of North America finally disappeared around 7,000 years later.

Did man hunt the mammoth to extinction?

"Well, if you don't prescribe it to human hunting," Finsley said, "then you've got to find another reason.

"The mammoths were certainly large and powerful animals, capable of defending themselves," Finsley said. "The grasslands, their food sources, certainly existed beyond their extinction.

"Disease? Perhaps, but that's difficult to prove," Finsley said. "We have only their bones and those don't show disease except for diseases of the bones."

The Grapevine mammoth finds date back to 20,000 years ago, however, 5,000 years prior to the coming of the hunters. Finsley said it's unlikely that this individual was hunted.

Following cleaning, the mammoth bones will be displayed at the museum.

"Jan (Moorman) will be doing the cleaning in the open," Finsley said. "We certainly want to invite the public down to watch."

Moorman said she will begin work on the bones after the July 4 holiday, and the bones should be ready for display by July 15.

20,000-year-old gift

For 27-year-old anthropologist Jan H. Moorman, the discovery of mammoth remains in a streambed north of the airport were a "mammoth event" in more ways than one.

First, the recently-graduated scientist said, "Here I was, just after graduation, and worried about finding a job." Not only did she play an integral part in the discovery, identification and removal of the fossils, but she wound up with the job of preparing them for display at the Dallas Museum of Natural History.

Better yet, Jan will be 27 for only two more weeks.

Unbeknownst to the prehistoric creature, he gave the young scientist one of the best birthday presents she's ever had — 20,000 years later.

Past comes alive in couple's hobbies

IS IT OR ISN'T IT? — Billie Jean Cooper of Colleyville poses with the curious find that drew a Dallas scientist to her home last week. The stone curiously has the mouthline, eye pit and spinal crest of a fossilized lungfish, but turned out to be a psuedo-fossil, a stone formed by natural forces to inmitate the remains of a prehistoric creature.

Dino tracks stir interest in prehistory

By T.G. SPEARS
Staff Writer

After dinosaur tracks were discovered in the spillway arroyo in March, infatuation with prehistory peaked among the local population. Fossil hunters crawled over construction sites and creekbeds looking for the stony evidence of distant times.

For Billie Jean Cooper of Colleyville, however, fossils are nothing new.

Eight years ago, the Cooper home was located on Minter Chapel Road, in what is now D-FW International Airport. In those days, the Coopers kept a garden, and each year's plowing surfaced handfuls of evidence that the Coopers were not the area's first inhabitants.

Arrowheads, stoneaxes, cutting tools and flint scrapers surfaced annually, and the Coopers built a fine collection. But after construction began on the world's largest airport, Mrs. Cooper said, she became aware of the land's more distant past.

"First, I found shark teeth in some of the drainage ditches," she said. "I called (Airport Director) Ernest Dean and he gave me permission to look for fossils in the construction areas."

A short time later, the Cooper's house was moved from its Minter Chapel site to its present Colleyville location. But Mrs. Cooper returned almost daily to the airport, searching for fossils before they were reburied or paved over and forever irretrievable.

"I think the construction men really thougt I was kind of strange," she said. "Toward the end, I would run along in front of the bulldozers looking for fossils before they could be covered up."

The Cooper collection grew daily. The dynamite and deep excavations at the airport provided Mrs. Cooper with outstanding specimens. Eventually, her collection reached its present size of over 800 pieces.

"They were kind of a problem storage-wise," she said. "I kept them in the house for a while, but the spiders decided my fossils were an excellent place to live."

The road plays hide-and-seek behind an overhanging vine. As the car turns down the dirt lane the house seems to grin like a child whose hiding place has been discovered. It is a sprawling one-story structure, with its back door turned toward the road.

Roy Cooper explains that the house, which used to sit on Airfield Drive, had to be moved to make way for Dallas-Fort Worth Regional Airport. In the procerss the front got turned toward the back and the back got turned toward the front. It worked out well, though, since the former front yard is now a sloping expanse of green privacy.

An old-fashioned wooden porch swing sits under the shade of trees. It is easy to imagine children playing chase or hunting Easter eggs on the lawn. Indeed the Coopers say their best times are when the grandchildren visit. A baby bed

One item in particular fascinated the Coopers. Roy Cooper found a large, bannana-shaped, orange-colored stone one afternoon incased in grey shale. He thought it would be an interesting piece in a rock garden.

The three-foot stone spent some months in the rock garden and much of the clay-like shale wore away. One day a visiting friend turned the stone.

"We were just kind of amazed," Mrs. Cooper said. "It was so obvious. We wondered how we hadn't noticed before.

At one end of the long, flat stone, where its width broadened and flattened to a curved point, was the mouth line. More amazing, a few inches above and behind the mouthline was a rounded protrusion in the shape of a fish's eye. Behind the head, the body rose to a spinal crest, exactly as if to support a dorsal fin, and then continued, becoming progressively flatter, until it reaced a pointed tail.

The stone no longer looked like a stone at all. It appeared to be the perfect cast of a fossilized lungfish, the lobe-finned fish that left the waters for the land 300 million years ago.

After reading about the excavation of the Grapevine dinosaur tracks in The Grapevine Sun, the Coopers notified the newspaper of their find.

The Sun then notified paleontologist Chuck Finsley, curator of earth sciences at the Dallas Museum of Natural History. Finsley was part of the team which excavated the Grapevine tracks last month.

"No, it isn't a fish," Finsley told the Coopers at their home Tuesday. "But it is one of the finest examples of a psuedo-fossil I have ever seen."

Psuedo-fossils are simply rock formations, which by natural direction, have the shape, size and color of true fossil remains of prehistoric creatures.

"It's one of the best I've ever seen," Finsley told the Coopers. "I'll gladly display it at the museum anytime for as long as you'll let us."

Among the remaining 800 pieces in the Cooper collection, however, Finsley found true fossils that may shed more light on the area's prehistoric past.

One section of a reptilian long bone is encrusted with gray stone and shells, which identify the bone as being taken from the Woodbine strata, the same strata which yielded the Grapvine tracks.

"While I can't positively identify this bone as that of a dinosaur," Finsley said, "I certainly cannot say that it isn't. And as far as I know, no dinosaur bones have been found in the Woodbine."

Finsley said should the bone prove to be from a dinosaur, it may have connections with the type of creature that left the Grapevine tracks.

Mrs. Cooper's collection also includes other bones, teeth, plants, wood, and an array of ammonites, the circular, chambered ancestors of modern squids. Many of the ammonites reveal details of the chambered structures of the creatures, which makes the Cooper ammonites some of the best Finsley has seen.

"The Coopers have an outstanding collection overall, particularly those pieces from the airport."

Since little fossil hunting is now possible on airport land, fossils in the Cooper collection can give scientists a better understanding of what the land there was like, Finsley said.

Big Mouth comes out of ground

Jaw, teeth of mammoth taken from creekbed

By ANITA BAKER
Star-Telegram Writer

While 18-wheelers whizzed on nearby highways and huge aircraft flew overhead Tuesday, a giant from another era was showing its teeth in a muddy creekbed just north of the Dallas/Fort Worth Airport.

Using shovels, trowels, and small brushes, a group of fossil lovers gently removed centuries of dirt from around the huge jaw and two giant teeth that once belonged to an imperial mammoth, the largest species of mammoths that once roamed North American.

The giant — probably 15 feet high at the shoulder with huge tusks that curled out 10 to 15 feet — roamed the airport area about 20,000 years ago when giant glaciers covered much of the northern sections of this continent and when some scientists believe humans were filtering in to North America. It grazed on the tall grasses growing in North Texas and then died in the prime of its life in some manner that could not be preserved in the sticky clay that protected the bones for centuries.

Rains and rushing creek water had washed away the years. About two weeks ago, when mowers were sent along the highways to cut the tall grass, one of the workers, Jimmy Conover, spotted a white outcrop unlike any of the rocks he had seen in the area.

Conover at the time worked for the company under contract to the State Department of Highways and Public Transportation to construct several highways through the area.

Fossil hunting had been a major part of his childhood and when he realized the exposed objects were not rock or a newly dead animal, he called an old friend, Jan Moorman, a recent anthropology graduate from the University of Texas at Dallas.

News of the find was passed on to the Dallas Museum of Natural History, which has a collection of bits and pieces of other ancestors of modern elephants.

That's how Charles Finsley, curator of earth science at the museum, got involved.

Initial checks confirmed the exposed bones and teeth belonged to a mammoth. Then rains began again for almost two weeks, delaying any chance for attempts at recovery.

But Monday the skies were clear and Finsley, Ms. Moorman, Conover, museum officials and several volunteer workers started their work. By Tuesday, they had uncovered enough to encase the jaw in plaster before picking it up out of the stream bed to take it to the museum for the final cleanup.

Although finding individual mammoth bones isn't that unusual in North Texas, the pieces found north of the airport are in better shape than most, Finsley said.

The two teeth — mammoths had only two large teeth on the bottom jaw that were replaced six times in their lifetime — are almost nine inches long and four inches wide and still contain original enamel. A portion of one of the tusks lay across the jaw, apparently washed there.

Finsley said his workers are searching the jawbone very carefully for any signs of human existence when the mammoth died. What they dream of finding is a spear tip embedded in the mammoth, providing what they feel would be evidence to prove humans roamed the continent at least 20,000 years ago. Scientists are still debating much of the evidence that purports to show how far back humans in North America went, he said.

Ms. Moorman will assist in cleaning the bones at the museum, probably in a special work area open to the public. Finsley said he hopes to have the fossils ready for display by the end of the summer. They will provide an excellent companion to the jawbone of a mastodon — a cousin of the mammoth — found in south Dallas several years ago.

Also found at the site were several rib bones and a tooth and bone from an ancient horse.

"It's a piece quite worth putting on display," Finsley said of the mammoth jaw.

Scientifically, the find is not significant, Finsley said, but "it is (significant) in public education and for display. . .," he said.

Mammoths were grass grazers and because of that, their teeth were flat, he said. Mastodons were browsers, eating leaves and limbs of trees. Their teeth have ridges somewhat similar to human molars, he said.

Mammoths, now extinct, were part of the elephant family and roamed most sections of the world during the Pleistocene epoch. The woolly mammoth was the most common and stood about 9 to 10 feet high at the shoulder. But the mammoths here were much larger.

Although glaciers during the ice ages did not reach as far south as Texas, they did have a profound influence on the area's animal and plant life, Finsley said. As glaciers extended farther south, the animals, were forced to retreat to the southern sections of the continent.

Couple discovers dinosaur tracks at lake here

By STEVE HUENNEKE
Staff Writer

Charlie and Julie Tyler of Farmers Branch were walking their two dogs about 300 yards east of the Grapevine Lake spillway on the afternoon of Sunday March 14 when they came upon the first dinosaur tracks ever discovered in the Dallas-Fort Worth area this side of Glen Rose.

The six tracks, they say, were made 85 million years ago by a Hadrosaur, a plant eating, web-footed, duck-billed dinosaur.

The discovery of the tracks would not have been possible without the washout of Fairway Drive and the golf course area following the overflow of the spillway in late October.

The erosion caused by the washout brought Julie Tyler—a 22-year-old geology student at Brookhaven Community College—to the area looking for fossils of aquatic life with her husband. She said she hardly expeced to find any evidence of dinosurs. Apparently, neither did anyone else.

"I was just looking for neat things for geology students to study," said Mrs. Tyler. "We let our dogs into the clear pond there to swim. When we stopped we were standing right on the tracks."

Charlie Tyler—a machinist for Otis Engineering in Farmer's Branch— noticed a pattern to the tracks, which looked like they were made by web-footed creature with three toes.

"I've been going to Glen Rose to look at dinosaur tracks for years and years," said Tyler. "We pretty well knew we had something."

(Editor's Note: Glen Rose—located in Somervell County—is the site of Dinosaur Valley State Park.)

Mrs. Tyler described her first reaction to the find.

"I felt as if I had seen them, surely somebody else had seen them," she said, adding she hadn't remembered any accounts of such a find in the area press or in scholarly journals.

For Mrs. Tyler, it turned out to be easier to find the tracks than it was to convince anybody the tracks were truly made by a dinosaur.

"One of the most frustrating parts was getting somebody interested," said Mrs. Tyler. "It took two or three days. At first, the (Dallas) Museum of Natural History wasn't even interested. They said it was virtually impossible those were dinosaur tracks."

Then Mrs. Tyler succeeded in contacting Norman McCloud, a graduate student at the SMU department of paleontology, who came out and took some pictures of the tracks, which are about 16 inches in length. After looking at the photos, members of the department came out to the site and verified the tracks were indeed made by a dinosaur.

See DINOSAUR, Page 4A

Dinosaur

Dr. Robert Slaughter, a professor in paleontology from SMU, and about 20 persons this week made plaster casts of the tracks and lifted them for transport to the Museum of Natural History. Aiding him in the work were representatives of the U.S. Corps of Engineers, students and faculty at SMU, University of Texas at Dallas and Brookhaven Community College; as well as representatives of the Dallas museum.

Scientists estimate the Hadrosaur was approximately 15 feet tall and weighed two to three tons. The dinosaur—which became extinct about 65 million years ago—stood on two feet. Slaughter said the find just further demonstrates that in the dinosaur's era, the Grapevine Lake area was a shoreline of a bay or other large body of water. Slaughter noted fossils and evidence of shells and aquatic life had already been noted around the lake.

Researchers have few footprints of the particular dinosaur because it frequented shorelines and its tracks were usually washed away.

The tracks have been identified as those of a Hadrosaur and are now being moved to the Dallas Museum of Natural History.

After party was over . . .

CISSY

It's the hangers-on who often get the best of a party. It surely happened that way at the brunch Ruta Lee gave after the Thalians Ball in Beverly Hills recently. Roy and Kay McDermott left just as Debbie Reynolds was driving up, but Jay Wallace, who co-hosted the brunch along with Ruta and her husband, Webb Lowe, and a handful of Fort Worth types still were around. Debbie — along with Ruta — spearheads the annual ball which benefits mental health in Southern California. Debbie usually is responsible for the program — and swears that she has to go to bed for three days to recover. As a result, she has never attended the brunch at Ruta's the day after the ball. This year, Debbie made it. In fact, she arrived at 3 p.m. and the group sat down to talk — and at 10 p.m. they still were talking. Ruta told Debbie she "either had to go home or spend the night here."

Debbie went home, but the stories she was telling about her early career at MGM studio probably will be going the rounds in Fort Worth for years. Debbie started out not only as a kid but a poor kid. She took the bus to the studio for a couple of years. The worst part about her bus trip was changing buses in downtown Los Angeles. In fact, up until the time she made the classic musical Singing in the Rain with Gene Kelly she still was taking the bus to work every day.

Being under contract to a studio was no assurance of making big money. When Debbie first was under contract, she was still too poor to buy her lunch in the studio commissary. She brought her lunch and bought herself a carton of milk. She would take her milk and her lunch to a grassy knoll to eat every day at noon. Debbie wasn't alone on that knoll. There was a young woman by the name of Lena Horne who joined her. Lena had money to eat in the commissary but blacks weren't accepted in studio commissaries in those days. Debbie Reynolds and Lena Horne still are close friends — thanks to those lunches on the grass.

Debbie was eating at the commissary by the time she made one of the Ma and Pa Kettle movies that starred Marjorie Main. Ms. Main's husband died a couple of years before she became the movie's Ma Kettle, but the actress refused to admit that he was dead. When she and Debbie went for lunch at the commissary, Ms. Main took two trays down the food line and filled them both, talking all the while with her husband. Debbie and Marjorie Main sat at a table with three trays of food, and after a while Ms. Main would say, "Don't you like that sandwich, honey? Well, don't worry, I'll eat it for you," and consume the food on the second of her two trays.

About that time, Debbie was making $250 a week but she only got $20 because she was still a minor and California law required that her salary be invested for her. She did manage to buy a second hand Packard. She remembers it as one of her favorite automobiles. It got her off that bus — and the transfer in downtown Los Angeles.

FW actress in new play

Joy Garrett, who is a former Miss Fort Worth, came to Ruta's brunch. She had planned to bring Fort Worth author Tommy Thompson with her, but Tommy wasn't feeling well enough to come. (Tommy died last Friday of cancer.) Joy currently is appearing in a Los Angeles theater called Twenty Four Hours. The show is in two segments of 12 five-minute vignettes, with the segments presented on alternate nights. Ruta and Jay saw the show while he was in Beverly Hills, and Jay says the production is great. Joy, of course, always is great.

Citizen of year

Former Arlington City Councilwoman Martha Walker will receive the first annual Arlington Citizen of the Year award at a dinner, program and dance at Rodeway Inn in Arlington Nov. 13. The award, for which a special design was commissioned, is called the Carolyn Snider award — named for the late Arlington councilwoman who was one of the most loved and respected community leaders in the city's history. James Miller is honorary chairman of the presentation, which will benefit Arlington Boys Club. Ticket information may by obtained by calling 988-3400. Rich Ashton and Sue Stevens are co-chairmen.

Colorful courthouse

The restored Tarrant County Courthouse is going to be more colorful than we ever remember it. Ward Bogard of Ward Bogard and Associates Inc., the architectural firm supervising the restoration project, had decided that the wood frames bordering the windows of the courthouse will be restored to their original dark green color. The color was popular in the 1890s when the courthouse was built. Carl Rezandes of the Boston-based Edward G. Perry Co. — color consultants and experts on restoration — determined the original color through a tedious process involving scratching through each layer of paint until the bottom layer of paint was reached.

After all that effort, Bogard didn't like the color until he realized that the copper-colored roof and the green window frames would "tie" the building together. Interior frames will be kept a dark brown to complement the woodwork. Reproductions of the original wood windows are being installed and painted. The square windows are being replaced but the round and arched windows are being repaired to cut costs.

Some changes are being made to conserve energy, but they will not be obvious. For example, windows will be double glazed instead of a single thickness for better insulation. You won't be able to open the windows. Fixed sashes are said to cut down outside air infiltration. The replacement wood frames are being pressure-treated to prevent decay and rot. Bogard expects them to last longer than the 90 years the first windows have lasted.

Restorers find 'gems' in county courthouse

By CLAIRE EYRICH
Star-Telegram Writer

As he scraped a bit of paint from a thickly coated doorframe to examine the layers beneath, Carlton Rezendes said "She's a grand old building after 90 years of wear."

Rezendes, a nationally known expert on restoration, observed of the Tarrant County Court House that "the exterior is surprising, and the interior details are almost Adam in design. The stenciling inside the rotunda should be preserved as nearly like the original as possible, and the staircase is a gem, although somebody has repainted its original cast aluminum and copper with bronze radiator paint."

President of the venerable Boston-based Edward K. Perry Co., Rezendes came to Fort Worth as a consultant on the painting of the courthouse interior, part of a multimillion-dollar restoration made possible by a 1980 bond issue. The Perry firm has accomplished such restorations as Boston's frescoed Trinity Church and Massachusetts' Old Sturbridge Village.

The Perry company is listed in the Boston Yellow Pages under Painting Contractors. This gives no hint of its fame as a firm of consultants on historic restorations, or the reputation of its president as a master conservationist. Walls a century or so old bring out their detective instincts, and they are noted for some esoteric specialties such as glazing, the ancient craft of applying a transparent wash of one color over another color, and wall and woodwork stenciling.

As a consultant on period colors, Rezendes advises on what colors and finishes were used on the Tarrant County Court House in 1893 and what should be used in restoration.

"Anything I came up with would be purely guessing," explains Ward Bogard, architect. "It's important to people interested in the courthouse restoration that we get this thing as nearly correct as possible, within the limits of creating a modern court building within the restoration of a 90-year-old structure."

Rezendes applauded the work done to reopen the rotunda and restore the east grand staircase, removed in 1946 to make way for a second, larger elevator. "The integrity of the building is intact," he said.

The closing of the rotunda and removal of one of the pair of staircases were only two of the structural changes made in the old building through the years. The major design element in the project centers on restoration of the rotunda, now stripped to its Palladian elegance and simplicity, open all the way up to the clock tower in the manner of the dome of the Texas State Capitol in Austin, one of the nation's fine domed buildings.

The adjoining lofty courtrooms and corridors will be restored to their original appearance, and the second curving staircase will be replaced so that the pair of them will rise from the lobby beneath the dome. This domed, multistoried space centers corridors on both an east-west axis and a north-south axis.

A design popular in Italy as early as the 15th century was adapted for use in American public buildings. The ornamentation and stained glass of the 1890s dome are viable again in the stripped-down interior and will be retained in the restored dome, visible from the first floor and symbolizing pride in community spirit and the importance of the public domain.

The flanking staircases will lead to the second floor with vaulted galleries circling the rotunda and leading to the courtrooms, which will be recreated in their original style and dignity, with the original dark woodwork and egg-and-dart mouldings retained along with other millwork and plasterwork ordered for the original courthouse.

WARD BOGARD, LARRY WALLS AND CARLTON REZENDES . . . look at the courthouse walls

Work reveals beauty

Tarrant County commissioners have received their first view of the Tarrant County Courthouse rotunda as it looked when the building was completed in 1896.

When the courthouse was remodeled in 1951 to make room for more office space, openings on the second and fourth floors were closed, blocking the view of the rotunda. The current renovation project restores the semicircular openings, allowing the rotunda to be seen from the first floor.

County Judge Mike Moncrief said the beauty of the restored building should offset concerns about the cost of the project, which has grown from about $6 million to $9.1 million.

When completed in July 1983, the building will house 10 courtrooms, the county clerk's office, a law library and Tarrant County Historical Commission archives.

Courthouse restoration lacks funds

By Robin Stringfellow
Fort Worth Bureau of The News

A $7 million estimate for the restoration of the historic Tarrant County Courthouse has spawned a new cry for public financial support to bolster the project's $6 million budget.

Construction manager Johnny Pittman issued the plea last week after bids for ornamental ironwork, primarily on two stairways, came in at $590,000, about $500,000 more than officials had expected.

"We need public support for this project right now," Pittman said. "It will take major cutbacks to get within the budget, and that could totally defeat the purpose of the restoration."

Pittman said that the bidding on the ornamental ironwork dealt a severe blow to the project, which was already substantially over budget. Although commissioners could opt to use cheaper materials at an overall savings of $350,000, Pittman said the action would amount to more of a remodeling effort than a restoration.

At stake, Pittman said, are projects such as the reconstruction of a second stairwell and original ceilings in some rooms. He said the county needs to step up efforts to woo public financial support.

County Judge Mike Moncrief, absent when the ornamental ironwork bids were opened Thursday, said he also is concerned about the project. However, he said, "I'm not ready to push the panic button yet."

"I think we've got to evaluate fully all the bids to get a good look at the project in its totality. Obviously, I think we're going to have to eliminate some major items," Moncrief said.

Since the cost overrun surfaced about a month ago, commissioners privately have grappled with figures, often refusing to reveal the actual cost of the project. Moncrief said he and the commissioners will conduct future meetings with architects and construction management officials behind closed doors.

"We don't need the kind of publicity we've been getting," he said.

Meanwhile, officials of the Texas Historical Commission, who have been monitoring the project since it began last year, said any major changes in the project's design must be approved by their office six months in advance. They said the notification would give state experts an opportunity to research ways to best preserve the essence of the project.

"It's not so much what it is that your doing, but how you do it," commission spokesman Dan Elswick said.

Elswick said changes in the project design could affect the courthouse's standing in the National Register of Historical Places and its eligibility for grant funds under the Texas Historial Landmark Program.

Assistant Tarrant County Planner Clete McAllister confirmed the county plans to apply for a grant under the provisions of the $250,000 landmark program.

The first two phases of the project have cost the county an estimated $1.5 million, said County Auditor Jack Benson. Because the county must pay $324,000 in construction management fees to Walker Construction Co. and an estimated $560,000 in fees to architect Ward Bogard, Benson said the county has less than $4 million left in its original budget for the restoration project.

ABOUT 'THE REST IS HISTORY'

2 CAMPAIGNS SPARKED IDEA OF SECTION

NUMBER OF PEOPLE DESERVE THANKS FOR THIS EDITION

Remember when you were in college and the rarest of things happened: You actually found a course that not only taught you something but was also a heck of a lot of fun. Well, producing this special section has been like that.

Those of us who worked on this section, The Rest of History, learned a great deal about the history of Tarrant County and Fort Worth — and we also had an immeasurable amount of fun doing it. We hope you get the same pleasure out of reading it.

Like Fort Worth history, which goes back generations, the history of this section goes back a few "generations."

The section's roots lie in an advertising campaign produced a few months ago called "Spend Some Time With the Star-Telegram."

Melinda Mason, the Star-Telegram's promotions director, working in close association with Greg Regian of McStay/Regian Associates Inc. of Fort Worth, produced the idea for the campaign. In their work on the "Spend Some Time" promotion they discovered the rich and colorful past held captive in our archives — yet without the time and space to republish the information. They also found a great number of readers who were keenly interested in Tarrant County history.

Along with Hugh Downey, the Star-Telegram's research director, they came up with the idea of a historical facts contest: It could not only be fun for readers, but could also be a way to call attention to the rich history of Tarrant County. The "Time Trivia Contest" was born. Mason, Regian and Downey faced an enormous task of gathering the information and putting it in an entertaining form, but they simply did a magnificent job.

The contest was lauched and the response was incredible. People from all over the county scrambled to find the answers to the questions. Whole families, entire departments of companies, were playing "Time Trivia". A man from Arlington said the contest prompted him to visit the public library for the first time in his life. At this writing, the number of entries exceeds 100,000. As an understatement, it is safe to say you liked it. Through Downey and Regian, the Star-Telegram contracted a local company, Expanco Inc., to sort the entries and they did an incredible job working under the pressure of deadlines.

That brings us to the present "generation." Downey, Mason and Regian again saw the need to share some of the history held in our archives. They worked out the details of a special section with the Star-Telegram advertising and editorial departments. Wes Turner, assistant advertising director, and Joe Ward, assistant retail advertising manager, put together an attractive sales presentation and The Rest Is History was off and running. Advertisers — many of whom played a big part in the history being told — responded in the same spirit and bought into the section with relish.

Carol Zuber, a Star-Telegram editor who has been on special assignment for several months, was assigned to put the section together. She jumped into the project with a contagious enthusiasm that soon spread throughout the newsroom. The teamwork by staff writers, editors, librarians and production departments began. Herb Williams, the Star-Telegram's editorial art director, was asked to design the section and produced outstanding work. Zuber nursed the idea of recapturing the "look" of old editions of the Star-Telegram through the design process and mastered it.

Staff writers Elston Brooks, Larry Swindell, Raymond Teague, Cissy Stewart and Jim Trinkle were asked to help us and share some of their appreciation for Fort Worth's history. They produced outstanding examples of fine writing. Other editors offered suggestions of what ought to be in the section. Jerry Flemmons, author of the book AMON and a long-time student of Fort Worth, offered us ideas about including classified ads, comics and stories in the section. Galyn Wilkins, sports director and columnist, helped with suggestions of great sports stories. Cissy Stewart not only acted as writer but also as a significant source of information and helped even more as contributing editor and a loaner of books. The morning-edition copy desk voluntarily proofed copy and worked between daily editions to help.

The librarians, particularly Hettie Arleth and Patricia Ward, worked with Zuber and were a tremendous help in locating hard-to-find files and dusty photographs. Sheryl Maxey and Jody Mapston spent hours typing stories into the computer.

Frank Adams and Belton Vickers of the composing room promised and delivered a crack crew of "printers", lead by Henry Phillips, to put the pages together.

At the risk of sounding like an Academy award acceptance speech, countless hours by many that are unnamed in this story should be thanked for their efforts to deliver to you one of the most interesting and colorful special sections we have ever produced.

We, the editors, of The Rest Is History, present this section in hopes you read it thoroughly, but we must also warn you. You may not only be entertained — you may learn something, too.

Promotion. "We felt like we needed a campaign to promote ourselves as the provider of local news for Tarrant County. What a better idea than to recall some of the past things we covered."

"In this market there are a lot of newcomers with no sense of tradition, or lack of roots," said Hugh Downey, the Star-Telegram's research director. "This was a good way to introduce a great many newcomers to the history of the area."

Gage said he's had a lot of calls from people concerned with errors in the newspaper's answers. Answers to all the questions have been printed in various parts of the paper several times during the contest period, and contest directors have acknowledged some mistakes. People could find all the answers in the paper, but many preferred to do their own research.

"It's amazing what's going on," said Greg Regian of McStay-Regian, the Star-Telegram's advertising-public relations firm handling the contest. "None of us ever anticipated it would be this big." Regian researched and wrote the copy for the newspaper's series of historical ads that preceded the contest and the "Time Trivia" page itself.

Obtaining correct historical information is always difficult, Gage said, because much must rely on people's memories, which vary so much. Sometimes what is printed in newspapers and elsewhere isn't correct, he said. "I think what will come out of this is a good clearing of the air about authenticating (historical) information that comes out in the newspapers."

Regian said one of the main problems in putting together the historical stories and questions is the contradiction of facts from different sources.

It's a problem that led to several errors or confusing statements in a few of the contest questions, Mason said. Some answers were changed at the beginning of the contest. Problem questions included:

No. 28 — "Tarrant County has had —— courthouses." The printed answer was three. However, several readers called or wrote questioning that answer, and, in fact, there were three in Fort Worth and the original in Birdville.

No. 62 — "Three early downtown movie theaters on Seventh Street were ——, —— and ——." The answers came out Palace, Worth and Majestic, but the third should have been the Hollywood.

No. 40 — "In 1943, General Dynamics was known as ——." The answer printed was Convair, but that came later. In 1943 it was known as Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp.

Mason said all answers printed in the Star-Telegram as well as other substantiated answers will be accepted.

Many callers to the paper talked about the impact the contest was having on their lives:

"My husband and I haven't played a game together before and we're having so much fun with this."

"I haven't been into a library in all my adult life, but now I've discovered the one in Arlington. I'm not interested in any of the prizes, but am enjoying the questions."

"My husband and I will probably get a divorce over this, because I won't let him use the paper to start a fire with. I'm saving them in case I miss an answer."

"I thought only a few people would enter this, but my whole office is fighting over the answers."

Each entry is marked for one of the eight prize categories and is in the running in only that category. The rules state that if two or more entry blanks contain all answers correct or an equal number of correct answers, the judges will hold a drawing to determine the winner of that prize. With so many entries, drawings are assured.

The most eye-catching prize is the classic 1953 Chrysler Windsor Deluxe with Fluid Shift.

"The Rest Is History" was a massive campaign of "The Fort Worth Star-Telegram" to increase awareness and appreciation of Tarrant Co. History.

ing Cromer to the courthouse really was entitled to the first. But the friend wanted No. 13 and so Cromer got No. 1. He sat on the courthouse steps for four hours in order to get it.

Cromer's first car was an old Rambler. Remnants of it still remain in his backyard at 1019 College Ave.

Every time a farmer found a chicken killed or a dog run over, they would call Cromer out to view the remains — and proceed to demand damages. Farmers appeared with shotguns sometimes when he drove the strange car through the rough wagon lanes of Tarrant County.

Terrified Animals, Fowls

The odd-looking automobile frightened horses, terrified cows and startled the chickenyards into loud squawks.

Cromer's tool chest on those perilous jaunts into the country was equipped with a pick, a shovel and a strong wire cutter.

Many a time he cut down fences and jogged through fields to keep from bogging in some country lane mudhole. The pick he used to whittle down the high centers of the old roads and remove stumps. The shovel came in handy when he encountered a sand bed.

are groping to find their bearings.

Had Dreams Of Wealth

They all seemed to be men who have had a vision of wealth, or better, a dream, and are having a hard time realizing that their bubble has burst. It is a far cry from the fantasies of high powered oil promotion to the cold reality of a jail and Cook and his associates hardly seem to have felt yet the chill shadow of the bars. They said they had expected an acquittal and then the verdict, like a thunderbolt.

Only one has broken down, Thomas O. Turner, 63. He was the geologist of the company and even Judge Killitts expressed sympathy for him. Turner is sick in the jail and has been placed in the hospital ward, according to his associates.

Most of the prisoners, when interviewed Thursday, were exceedingly anxious to ascertain public sentiment. "What do the people think about us?" was the universal question.

All of them still contend that they had no "criminal intent."

Cook himself declined to make an comment or answer to the scathing denunciations poured upon him by Judge Killitts Wednesday night in court.

"I am absolutely penniless," Cook declared. "I am broke. Every penny I made went into dryholes. The books show where the money went. That should have been developed. The government knew it."

Cooks' present condition is in great contrast to his former kaleidoscope career which is rich with adventure and turmoil, with bright spots as well as dark.

Physician, scholar, writer, geologist, Artic explorer, adventurer and oil promoter are a few of the roles he has already played.

His has been a life of contests against the greatest obstacles, those of nature; a life broadened by education, writing and travel; a life brightened by the plaudits of the world, scientists and kings, as well as marred by the maledictions of many; a life of experience that has ranged from the frozen stretches of the Arctics to the wilds of the tropics; from the summits of high peaks to the bowels of the Earth; a life that has been tarnished by charges of "fakir" and "fraud artist" — but, withal, a life replete with the elements that engross interest.

George Dolan
THIS IS WEST TEXAS

(EDITORS' NOTE: This is the first George Dolan column ever to appear on the front page of the Star-Telegram. It was written over 25 years ago and caused some reaction from readers at the time. We believe it is one of George's best columns and shows one of the reasons that he has remained a very important voice of the Star-Telegram over the years.

The row of taverns lining the highway between Odessa and Andrews presents no particular law enforcement problems, officers say.

"Just minor stuff," a deputy sheriff said. A city police official agreed.

Something you should bear in ·1957·

mind, though, before pub crawling along Tavern Trail is that while getting your face bashed in is minor stuff to a cop, it is downright major to you.

So choose carefully before you decide which to quench the old thirst in. Most of them have an unsavory appearance. The rest look worse.

Officers keep an eye on the joints. The Odessa police force maintains a 24-hour patrol on those inside the city limits. The sheriff's department follows suit with those outside Odessa but inside the Ector county line.

You pick one that looks not-so-tough, take a deep breath, and walk in. Eight sets of eyes turn on you. You suddenly recall reading that snakes have no eyelids and therefore can not blink. You wish you had left you necktie in the car.

George Raft Extras

You order a beer and look around. The owner of the unblinkingest eyes is wearing a burr haircut, T-shirt and muscles. He looks like Gargantua with a shave and haircut.

His companion, dark and thin, appears to have been manufactured especially to play supporting roles in George Raft pictures.

You can imagine the two of them driving down the road after a hard day's work — bank-robbing, possibly — and seeing the sign: BEER.

They look at one another.

"?"

"!"

After the meeting of minds, they stop to guzzle.

A barmaid interrupts your thoughts.

"Hiya tonight, honey?" she asks professionally, and walks your way.

You mumble something and steel yourself. She walks on past you, heading for the ladies' room. You feel more relieved than she will.

A couple at a table, sitting around a bottle of bourbon, talk quietly. On the right, a stout party perspires over a bowling slot-machine game.

Muscles, his sidekick and two barmaids start a game of shuffleboard. The stout citizen walks over to kibitz.

He makes some comment. No one answers.

The fellow at the table, who is wearing a white dress shirt and dark, bell-bottomed trousers, slips a coin in the juke box. Elvis Presley's voice booms out so suddenly that you jump. He's trying to make some point about being "all shook up."

You suddenly feel a need for a swallow of beer. You gulp and get out, trying to look casual.

City Of Culture

It occurs to you that to be courteous you should visit a Midland bar, too. Besides, you didn't finish that other beer.

Odessans speak sneeringly of Midland as a city of culture.

The Midland tavern, called Club something, is as dark as 15 down a well. Some of the male patrons are wearing coats and ties. You feel uneasy about the "club" title.

Once safely at the bar, you admit to a next-stool neighbor (no muscles, one bow tie) that you feared the place would admit only members.

"It is pretty exclusive," he says. "No diphtheria cases allowed." He laughs too loudly.

You wish that you were Muscles, just for 30 seconds. You'd knock this overdressed little creep right off his stool.

10TH OF CITY FLOODED; THOUSANDS HOMELESS

Death toll in Tuesday's flood, one of the worst in Fort Worth's history, stood at six Tuesday night. Thousands were homeless.

Early in the day the number of homeless was placed at 1,000, but as the flood waters continued to spread, it grew until late Tuesday. The Red Cross Survey Committee, headed by Col. Andrew F. Price, placed the total at 13,200.

·1949·

Police Chief Dysart estimated that one-tenth of the city's total area was under water.

Weather forecasters predicted considerable cloudiness and scattered thunderstorms Wednesday and Thursday afternoons.

City water supply was acute and City Manager Jones said he feared it might be four days before normal service is restored.

Automobile travel between downtown and Northside, Arlington Heights and Riverside areas was impossible Tuesday night. Main arteries between the sectors were flooded.

North Main was limited to emergency traffic only. Police feared another levee break might let water gush over the street.

COURTHOUSE SQUARE FILLED WITH SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS

(Following story was published in 1949 after an interview with Mrs. Jennie H. Berney, who remembered back to the Christmas of 1878 when she was 14.)

Yesterday the courthouse square was filled with wagons and buckboards belonging to farmers for miles around.

The farmers disposed of their produce then with wives and children they joined neighbors buying groceries, dry goods and toys and the inevitable jug of whisky.

Duty done, rural menfolks visited in turn billiard and gaming halls and imbibed free Tom and Jerry, eggnog and hot rum, Mrs. Berney recalled. "At noon the majority

REV. J. FRANK NORRIS IS BACK VICTORIOUS FROM MURDER TRIAL

Rev. J. Frank Norris returned last night to his flock at the First Baptist Church and was greeted by a crowd that packed the big auditorium to welcome him back from Austin where Tuesday night he was acquitted of a charge of murder.

Scores of people lined the sidewalks on both side of the street waiting for his arrival on the interurban train at 6:40 p.m. at the interurban station at Third and Main streets.

Even at that hour scores of people were filing through the doors into the church auditorium. Rev. Mr. Norris walked into the church at 7:45 and the great throng immediately rose and stood while he walked up the steps to the platform.

In his sermon, Rev. Mr. Norris only made some minor references to Tuesday when he had embraced his lawyer and cried as the verdict of "not guilty" was read. Last July, the pastor had shot to death D.E. Chipps, Fort Worth lumber dealer.

REV. J. FRANK NORRIS

Tuesday the spacious courtroom in Austin had been as packed as the church was Thursday. Despite pleas from the judge, the courtroom had erupted in applause as the district clerk read the not guilty verdict.

Faces of 'Hole in the Wall' gang captured in photograph here

West Texas officers have been warned to be on the lookout for the "Wild Bunch" which was discovered to have made a clandestine visit to Fort Worth recently. A sharp-eyed Pinkerton detective has found this engraving at a Fort Worth photography artist's studio and has identified the subjects as, from left, Harry Longbaugh, alias "Sundance Kid"; Bill Carver; Ben Kilpatrick, the "tall Texan"; Harvey Logan, alias "Kid Curry"; and "Butch" Cassidy.

This is the first look Pinkerton's has had at these desperadoes it has been chasing. The criminals, also known as the "Hole in the Wall" gang, are believed to have left the area after hiding in Fannie Porter's place in "Hell's Half Acre."

GOV. "MA" FERGUSON

AMON G. CARTER

The governor asks Carter to quit post

AUSTIN — Resignation of Amon G. Carter as a member of the board of directors of the Texas Technological College was requested in a letter Monday by Gov. Ferguson.

The letter assures the task is unpleasant to the governor and states that she is informed that in December last year Carter "fitted up a building owned or controlled by you (perhaps a garage building) in the old-fashioned bar room way, providing a bar with the foot rail and the sawdust on the floor and behind the bar you had a man dressed in the old-fashioned bartender white apron style," for the Oil Men's Association in Fort Worth.

Has Cane in Possession

"To this place I am informed that you invited some 200 or 300 guests and to those who came, you dispensed drinks that were to say the least, stimulating and that you caused to be given away souvenir canes in which there is a hidden vial some 30 inches in length that contained approximately one pint of beverage," the letter reads.

"I have one of the canes in my possession which I am reliably informed came from your place. I am also informed that at said reception given by you many became stimulated and others were under the influence of an invigorating decoction, and that you in company with your guests participated in the consumption of the beverage."

Reward Is Offered

Amon G. Carter is president of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. At the Texas A&M College and Texas University football game Thanksgiving Day he is reported to have admitted yelling "Hurrah for Texas Aggies and Dan Moody."

Moody is the attorney general of Texas, who has been investigating the State Highway Department and who has recovered $600,000 from the American Road Company.

CARSWELL JET FLIES AROUND THE WORLD

Girdling the world in 94 hours for the first non-stop global flight in aviation history, an 8th Air Force B-50 Stratobomber, Lucky Lady II, ended its mission at Carswell Air Base at 9:22 a.m. Wednesday.

Secretary for Air Symington, on hand to congratulate the plane commander, Capt. James G. Gallagher, and his crew, told newspaper men:

·1949·

"This is an epochal step in the development of air power. What it actually does is to turn our medium bombers into intercontinental bombers."

Flying the "long way around" near the equator on most of its course, the bomber covered 23,452 miles.

Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, chief of the Air Force, grasped the hand of each of the 14 airmen from Lucky Lady as the ship taxied up to the ramp at 9:39 a.m., shut off its engines, and the weary fliers climbed out.

Lt. Gen. Curtis E. LeMay, Strategic Air Command chief, the man who directed the fire-bombing of Japan by B-29s and the dropping of the atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, beamed proudly and told interviewers:

"This means that we now can deliver an atomic bomb to any place in the world that requires an atomic bomb."

The flight was an 8th Air Force show from start to finish — the plane a standard, battle-equipped bomber of the 43rd Bombardment Wing based at Tucson, Ariz., the crew a regular crew from that wing and the entire operation directed by Maj. Gen. Roger Ramey, 8th commander, from his headquarters at Carswell.

FW THRILLS PRESIDENT; DALLAS NEXT

By JERRY FLEMMONS and GEORGE SUMMERS
Star-Telegram Writers

Nov. 22, 1963 — The rains that pelted the downtown area stopped magically as if by command Friday morning when President Kennedy made his public speech in the parking lot south of the Hotel Texas.

Kennedy talked about manned aircraft, the nation's space program and the U.S. economy in his hurriedly delivered remarks to thousands of cheering citizens.

The president had just left a

standing ovation of 3,000 persons who attended the Chamber of Commerce-sponsored breakfast in the hotel.

The president walked out of Hotel Texas' Eighth Street entrance behind Gov. John Connally, Congressman Jim Wright, U.S. Sen. Ralph Yarborough, Vice President Lyndon Johnson and others.

As President Kennedy walked to the speaker's stand, spectators beckoned him to come close to the rope that held them back. The president answered their calls, spending several minutes shaking hands and talking with the crowd.

Some of the spectators held signs which said:

"Welcome to Fort Worth, Mr. President."

Another sign read: "Welcome to Texas, Jack and Jackie."

When the president and his party finally mounted the speaker's stand, the crowd shouted: "Where's Jackie? Where's Jackie?"

Although Wright was making remarks over the microphone, President Kennedy heard the calls for his pretty wife and looked upward toward the hotel and pointed a finger toward the eighth floor, meaning Mrs. Kennedy was still in Suite 850.

"Going Forward"

"There are no faint hearts in Fort Worth," Kennedy commented in response to the cheering of the crowd.

The president concluded his remarks with a statement which brought cheers from the crowd:

"Here in the rain in Fort Worth, and in Texas, and in the United States, we are going forward."

The vice president called Kennedy "able and beloved" and said he is "the fearless leader" of the United States and the free world.

The Rest is History is an outgrowth of one of most popular special promotions that the Star-Telegram has ever published. The promotion was titled "Spend Some Time with the Star-Telegram" — which later generated the "Time Trivia Contest." The response was so great, it became apparent that many readers were eager to have more information about the history of the area where the West truly begins (and where Dallas peters out, as Will Rogers put it).

So we are offering this special section of colorful news, sports and feature stories from the archives of the Star-Telegram. They are true news stories, plus original recollections of those who lived some of the events. This is not a history lesson in the traditional sense, although historically accurate, but rather a different perspective on the people, places and events that helped shape our part of the world into one of the best, and most interesting, places to live.

We hope you enjoy reading it as much as we did researching it.

For a more complete look at those who worked on the section please see story on Page 8BB.

BEAR IN MIND

THAT IF STRIPLING SAYS ITS SO, ITS SO, and while we do not use much space today we are doing the LEADING SPRING BUSINESS OF THIS SECTION. Once a customer — always a customer is the inevitable result of all who have ever traded at Stripling's. To those who are yet strangers to the house (and there are not many) we will say come and get acquainted and you will NEVER REGRET IT. We do not handle millinery goods but could not resist the TEMPTING OFFER of a consignment of TWENTY DOZEN LADIES' TRIMMED EASTER HATS, imported and domestic shapes and trimmed by New York and Baltimore pattern trimmers. A pattern hat is MORE CAREFULLY and MORE TASTEFULLY gotten up by MORE COMPETENT MILLINERS than the regular stock of millinery trimmed hats. Every hat is "STRICTLY UP TO DATE" and while some are "just too lovely for anything," others are regular "poems" and "day dreams." Thus is how we will sell them: A lady's trimmed hat that would cost you $5 at a millinery store will only cost you $2.50 AT STRIPLING'S. A regular $6 hat at the milliner's, STRIPLING'S PRICE $3. A spring dream of a hat costing $10 to $12 will only cost $4 AT STRIPLING'S.

Our Organdies and all wash dress goods are the prettiest in town and our prices from 4 to 5c per yard LESS than any other concern. Our $5.00 MEN'S SPRING SUITS double discount anything offered in this county for the same or more money. Our $1.00 Men's Pants are bringing $1.50 at regular clothing stores. OIL CLOTHS 10c. 25,000 yards of embroideries and laces at prices that will cut them up in quick order. Every customer is impelled by force of LOW PRICES to take home a dress pattern of our 5c PERCALES. The best $1.25 ladies(fb) or gentlemen's shoe in the state, same thing cost $2.25 at a regular shoe store. One lot of boys' school suits at 50c to $2.00. One lot figured lawns, 10 YARDS FOR 10 CENTS. One lot regular $3.00 men's fine fur black planter hats go at $1.25. One lot Jabez C. Knight Gold Medal and Lonsdale cambric at 6c. The largest, best selected and cheapest line of prints and plaids in the city, and the price — well, you come up and look and we will tell you. If we mentioned our prices here it would make our brother merchants very much vexed because they cannot meet us. STRIPLING IS HEADQUARTERS FOR SPRING BARGAINS, and Stripling's busy store denotes something. Where there is smoke there's fire. The INTELLIGENT BUYER and INDEPENDENT DOLLAR don't trade these hard time at high-priced concerns. They quickly find out the true worth of an advertisement, and that is the reason some merchants say advertising don't pay. The advertising is all right, but they handle the truth so carelessly that the trade is disappointed and their store is empty. If we ever advertise GOLD DOLLARS FOR 50 CENTS APIECE you can hook up the sorrel mare and come right along, for as sure as fate we will have them JUST AS ADVERTISED.

Every father, mother, sister and brother who are mutually interested in domestic economy, and would like to learn how to enjoy the full benefits of a DOLLAR PROPERLY INVESTED IN SPRING ATTIRE, should not fail to read W. C. STRIPLING'S ADVERTISEMENT in the FORT WORTH DISPATCH TOMORROW EVENING.

The story is told in a PLAIN, FORCIBLE and truthful manner, and your good judgment will prompt you to CAREFULLY INVESTIGATE BEFORE DOING YOUR SPRING TRADING.

The leader of low prices is W. C. STRIPLING, 209-211 HOUSTON STREET.

sell the business," Mrs. Nichols said.

"I didn't know a thing about (engraving) when I started," she said. She now has seven or eight salesmen and is selling glasses in Florida, Michigan, Kansas, Louisiana, Colorado, California, Utah and throughout Texas.

She engraves each pair of sunglasses individually with the chosen logo, design or initials. When a client asks for a new design, she draws it and then carves it on linoleum. The next step is to engrave it on a brass plate that can be placed in the jig (engraving machine) and engraved onto the glasses.

"Our most popular design is the triple butterflies. The eagle is the most popular with the guys," she said. They also offer logos of cats, dogs, mushrooms, flowers, frogs, an Arkansas razorback, a longhorn and many others.

The Nichols had a booth at the State Fair of Texas this year and developed many contacts there. They now have several large accounts. One 52-store company in California is selling Mrs. Nichols' glasses in its spring catalog.

"I work all the time. I may watch one hour of TV a day. I stay busy with engraving or bookwork constantly," she said.

She feels the secret to her success is that she carefully prices her merchandise and meets her shipment deadlines. "If I promise I'll do something, I'll do it. I feel that's the way to treat people.

"I also don't try to get rich off the poor people. I had my glasses cheaper than anybody else at the fair and sold more," she explained.

Mrs. Nichols' other artistic endeavors include wall arrangements, flower arrangements, Christmas decorations and internal engraving in plastic.

"Just about everything in my home is homemade. I just love to show my things. Mama started me sewing on a sewing machine when I was 10 and I've been doing things ever since," she said.

Arlington Downs handled $2 million on "good days" despite the Depression.

"They're at the post. They're off! They're rounding the turn. Pansy Walker is in the lead by the rail. Roars from 20,000 throats drown out the hoofbeats."
Taken from 1933 Star-Telegram

No, this wasn't Kentucky. Or even Louisiana.

This was Texas. Arlington, Texas. Home of the first thoroughbred track ever in the Lone Star State.

Mars Shield, 1937 Texas Derby winner.

Arlington Downs. Pet project of the man claimed to have amassed the richest fortune west of the Mississippi, W.T. Waggoner.

Rancher and cattle baron, Waggoner was famous for complaining that every time he dug a water well, he struck oil. He also became a famous horse breeder and racer, provided mostly by his Three D Stock farm in the rural community of Arlington.

To Waggoner's chagrin, parimutuel betting had been outlawed in Texas in 1909. But twenty years later, he would wait no longer. Into the teeth of the Great Depression, Waggoner committed $3 million to build the finest horse racing layout this side of Kentucky.

The definitive stable boy.

Arlington Downs drew huge attention—and controversy. State Senator Julien C. Hyer called it "a hotbed for law violations," in reference to the obvious unauthorized gambling at the track. Waggoner hired a squad of security officers to enforce the ban, so at least for the record books, those early races were strictly "non-profit affairs."

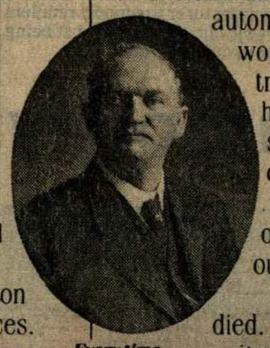
Behind the scenes, Waggoner worked vigorously to repeal the betting ban. Finally, in 1933, he pulled it off. That year, Texas again legalized gambling. And Arlington Downs was really off to the races.

Despite the nation's poor economic health at the time, the track took in as much as $2 million across its betting windows on "good days." Thousands of spectators, including governors, dignitaries, opera stars and political figures frequented the Downs.

Pansy Walker, the famous filly whose victory was reported in the above Star-Telegram excerpt, was just one of the nationally renowned thoroughbreds to compete in such heralded races as the Texas Futurity.

Thousands would motor to Arlington Downs on raceday.

At the age of 82, paralyzed on one side and unable to leave his automobile, W.T. Waggoner would park next to the track and listen for the hoofbeats of his beloved steeds. Ironically, the cheers from the crowds which often numbered over 20,000, drowned out the hoofbeats.



Every time W. T. Waggoner dug for water, he struck oil.

In 1934, Waggoner died. Texas racing had lost its champion. Predictably, betting was voted out the very next election.

Without legal gambling, Arlington Downs faded. During the forties it became a storage warehouse for World War II government goods. A few rodeos and some specialty shows were tried, but the magic was missing.

Finally in 1957, the horse barns and grandstands of Arlington Downs gave way to the growth needs of a booming Arlington. And the Downs was razed to make room for industrial development.

Arlington Downs is history. But the cheers haven't stopped. They're louder today. The Texas Rangers Baseball Club, UTA Mavericks and high school and community teams get them now.

And still there, through all the years and cheers, is the Star-Telegram.

Silver-dollar collectors turned out for the auction last month in which the Carnegie Museum of Natural History divested itself of some long-held prizes. The sale had attracted national attention because of protracted legal hurdles raised against the sale by organizations concerned about the museum's collection.

It took two years for the courts to clear the sale, a time in which the Pittsburgh museum pointed out that it was maintaining a large part of its collection and finding settings in other institutions in which to house specialized parts of the collection.

The sale, managed by Spink & Son, raised $429,885.

Since much of the sale involved silver dollars, collectors and investors alike had watched the sale as an indicator of both market vitality and specific prices. The 244 dollars in the collection ranged from first-year-of-issue pieces through the Morgan dollars from several mints, and trade dollars and patterns. The star of the sale was the 1794 dollar, which, although only in very good condition, still brought $12,500.

Probably more significant, because of the relatively recent minting and its pristine condition, an 1895 Morgan dollar sold for $9,500. That dollar was struck, in that year, only in Philadelphia, New Orleans and San Francisco. Since the Philadelphia Mint struck a mere 12,880 pieces, those 1895 dollars without a mint mark are collectors' prizes. Standard price references for the coin put its value near $20,000, and the discrepancy is still another indicator of the state of the market. Spink & Son can see in the sale prices signs of recovery in the market, but the market has a long way to go.

look upon it as a contraption of doom, as some do, but as an indispensable vehicle. It enables me to live a near normal life in that I can manuever it around my house extremely well, doing all necessary chores.

When I acquired my wheelchair, I acquired enough independence to remain in my home alone. I didn't want to give up my home and live my remaining years in my children's homes or a nursing home.

By using my wheelchair I can also go shopping in the large malls; see the sights; enjoy eating out; and meeting people.

When I visit in my children's homes, I can only look at what other are having to do for them because they refuse to use a wheelchair.

The old myth of a person in a wheelchair as helpless is still unfortunately the belief of many. It is just the opposite. A wheelchair makes a person much more independent, gives him many more opportunities, and allows him to enjoy his remaining years more.

I am young only to heart and spirit but look forward with faith and determination. Right now I appreciate my chair as a "haven of security" and just thank God it was invented before I needed it.

My Christmas wish elderly and the handicapped that will aid them toward independence. Devices that help you put on your socks to devices that aid you in safely getting in and out of the tub. Devices to help you read, see, hear, drtess, bathe, play, eat, cook, drive, swim, sew, garden and the list goes on.

Ancestors

By DAMON VEACH

Richard Todd Copeland was born February 22, 1815 in Chesterfield County, South Carolina and lived in Middle Tennessee from about 1825 to 1849. He moved to Corinth, Howard County, in southwest Arkansas where he died on November 30, 1890.

Copeland is the subject of a new book called The Family of Richard Todd Copeland, 1815-1890, Ancestors and Descendants, compiled by Lawrence H. Roberts, 1507 E. University, Magnolia, Arkansas 71753.

Part 1 attempts to provide information on the ancestors of Richard Todd Copeland. Much of this date has not been verified because of lack of proper and accurate record-keeping systems of the period. It was, however, based upon careful analysis of the available facts. As other information becomes available, some of this, of course, will be altered or updated.

The second part of this softcover book is a listing of as many descendants of Richard Todd Copeland as could be obtained.

The Copeland surname is also spelled Copland and Coupland. The earliest record of the name appears at Dundas, Scotland in 1160, and in 1200, a Thomas de Copeland held land in Kelso, Scotland.

Dr. Nelson Copeland of Lexington, Kentucky made a trip to England in December of 1976 and gathered much information on the family. In a letter from this descendant, the following is given: "There are several areas in the British Isles which carry the name Copeland. Some of these areas are spelled Coupland, but apparently they all arise from the same source. In the North Unberland area of England, there is a Coupland castle which is four miles northwest of Wooler on the River Glen....and in the Westmorland area of England, there is an administrative district which is named Copeland. Within the county also is a forest named Copeland.

There are also Copeland Islands, in Ireland at the southern entrance to the Belfast Lough."

According to Dr. Copeland, tradition has it that the land was given to a Norman knight named Copeland who had defeated King David of Scotland

When he visited Whitehaven in the District of Copeland, he talked with a retired librarian who said the name was Norse for "bought land." The term was used to differentiate bought land from hereditary land. It seems that the Normans had established a barony in that area after their invasion and had named it Kaupuland in order to point out that it was bought land.

One of the few sources of information about the southern line of Copelands is an unpublished manuscript, Many Years After, written by D. Graham Copeland in 1939 after more than thirty years of research. The manuscript was given to the South Carolina Library, Columbia, South Carolina in 1940, where it is still located.

It is not known when the Copelands actually came to America, but according to the manuscript, the first reference is found in the Virginia Magazine of History and Biography and is Patrick Copeland, who was selected as the first "Rector" of a school which was to open on Good Friday, 1622 in Charles Cittie, Virginia.

The northern branch of the Copeland family, begining with Lawrence Copeland who settled in Massachusetts in 1630, is well documented. Indications are that the southern branch descended from John Copeland, brother of Lawrence.

Further information on this book can be obtained directly from the compiler.

No sunshine in this mine

KELLOGG, Idaho (AP) — The Sunshine Mining Co. announced Saturday it is closing its 98-year-old silver mine here indefinitely and laying off 450 hourly employees.

Spokeswoman Sandy Erickson said the shutdown would last "at least" until silver prices rise substantially. She estimated the company may re-open the mine in about six months.

The company will retain about 150 clerical and salaried workers, she said.

Employees scheduled to work the afternoon shift Saturday were notified of the layoffs at about 5 a.m.

American Airlines took off from Main and Seventh.

The Aviation Building at Main and Seventh was acclaimed as "the only building in the world dedicated solely to aviation activities."

Just 14 years after the Wright Brothers took off, and the same year Lindbergh flew solo across the Atlantic, Texas Air Transport was operating in Fort Worth. T.A.T. was founded by Alva Pearl Barrett.

At the time, Texas Air Transport derived the bulk of its income from five-dollar thrill rides. In 1928, it began flying mail to such cities as Houston, Waco, Austin and Dallas. In 1929, passenger service was started.

Forerunner to American Airlines. Texas Air Transport combined with Gulf Airlines to become Southern Air Transport. Headquarters remained in Fort Worth. In 1930, Southern was one of three airlines that formed American Airways. Four years later, American Airways officially became known as American Airlines.

Fort Worth's modernistic Aviation Building. In addition to starting Texas Air Transport, A. P. Barrett built another monument to aviation, the beautiful Aviation Building which stood at Main and Seventh Streets. It was built in record time — five months and 28 days.

Formally opened in 1930, the 16-story building featured an art deco lobby, finished in Italian marble and aluminum. "Ice water" was provided on every floor from an artesian well beneath the building. The building even boasted reversible ceiling fans and venetian blinds in every office. High atop the Aviation Building was a special penthouse — the first structure in Texas built specifically for a radio station (KTAT).

More recently, the Aviation Building was known as the Trans-American Building.

A historic block. The Aviation Building was just one of the famous occupants of the block bounded by Main, Commerce, Sixth and Seventh. Byers Opera House and the Palace Theater were also located here.

Continental National Bank took off in 1903. By the time American Airlines became a reality, our bank had grown to nearly $12 million in total assets.

Continental National's home at the time was the W. T. Waggoner Building at Eighth and Houston. We remained at this location from 1921 to 1952, a period of extraordinary growth for our bank and our city.

In 1952, with total assets of more than $64 million, we moved to our present location at Seventh and Houston.

Soon we move to Main at Seventh. Now, with assets of more than $750 million, Continental National Bank is preparing for still another move. This time to Continental Plaza, located on the same historic block where the old Aviation Building once stood.

We like to think that in the future, in the past, CNB will be helping a lot of new and existing businesses really take off — from Main at Seventh.

Tarrant scholar keeps ear tuned to history's beat

By Pat Gordon
Mid-Cities Bureau of The News

HURST — As a kid, Duane Gage heard the distant beat of Indian drums and listened to elm leaves rustling overhead, next to the aging stagecoach station he called home.

He wandered the Oklahoma countryside, finding arrowheads and potsherds, and his grandparents passed on stories about homesteading in a dugout and about relatives fighting in the Civil War.

Gage latched on to the past, demanding that he learn more about all the yesterdays that made today possible.

Gage, a Tarrant County Junior College history professor and Tarrant County Historical Commission chairman, said: "I always wanted to know more about what happened. When I was a kid, I could sit under those huge elm trees and hear the leaves whisper about what had happened, and I could see the cuts left by wagon wheels on their way to the fort. I was born during the Dust Bowl, and that's why people say I'm so energetic — if I had ever stood still, I'd have been covered up."

There's not much dust swirling through suburban Hurst these days, but if there was, Gage would be in no danger of being buried. Although the spring semester is over at the Northeast Campus of the Tarrant County Junior College, Gage's office telephone seems to be ringing constantly. When students aren't calling, a member of the historical commission is.

A person doesn't have to travel to Gage's birthplace near the Washita River in Oklahoma, where in 1868 Gen. George Custer wiped out a Cheyenne village, to find history.

Gage discovered that Tarrant County also is rich in history when he was appointed to establish a local history museum at the college during the Bicentennial.

"I discovered everything I touched on the local level had application in the classroom," Gage said as he showed off the college museum's small collection of Indian grinding stones, arrowheads and other artifacts dating to the 1800s. "If something happened in Boston, something was also happening here, especially in the past 140 years."

Tarrant County was touched by Manifest Destiny, the U.S. expansion into new territories, when the first white settlers set up housekeeping, said Gage, who holds a master's degree in history from the University of Oklahoma.

Tarrant County also fought the Civil War, he said. Secession passed by less than 50 votes in Tarrant County, and some residents left to fight for the Union instead of the Confederacy.

"And during Reconstruction, Mosier Valley was created by freedmen here," Gage said. "Things weren't just happening back East but to people living right here."

Little did the Tarrant County commissioners know when they appointed Gage to the historical commission board how far their appointment would reach. As he became more involved, Gage insisted that his students do likewise.

Each semester he assigns students a major project involving family or local historical research. The students benefit, he said, by learning about original documents, and the commission ends up with hundreds of research topics for the archives.

"The students don't think the project will be interesting, then they surprise themselves," said Gage, 48. "They end up talking to relatives they've always taken for granted. One student even discovered a living grandfather she didn't know about and ended up spending Christmas with him."

The blond-headed Gage, who grew up knowing his great-great-grandfather was a "blanket Indian," and hearing tales about other relatives settling in the Texas Hill Country, is amazed that people don't bother to discover their ancestors. Often, he said, they wait until the relatives who could fill them in are dead.

"I don't understand it," Gage said. "One thing that surprised and disappointed me was the descendents of the old pioneer families here have done so little to compile a family history. They're very appreciative of our efforts, but it makes preservationists wear out faster."

The $2,000 a year budget limits historical commission members. They can only encourage and educate others to keep the past intact. They cheer others on, help with research for the Texas Historical Marker program and prod those who wait.

People such as Sid Bass and his renovation of old Downtown Fort Worth buildings who save preservationists' sanity, Gage said.

"It's a constant crisis to go out and save as much as we can while we can. We often don't hear about a worthwhile structure until it's too late," Gage said.

Georgia native dives headlong into history of Grapevine area

Dee Barker has a passion for history. "When you go into a new place you can't appreciate it until you know its history," she explains. Barker, who is a native of Atlanta, Georgia, probably knows more about Grapevine than many who have lived all their lives here.

Since moving to Colleyville in the 1960s Barker has become active in several local historical organizations including the Northeast Historical Society, Grapevine Historical Society and the Tarrant County Historical Commission. She was instrumental in organizing the preservation of the Torian cabin.

Barker was recently profiled in the newsletter of the Historic Preservation Council for Tarrant County. Duane Gage, chairman of the Tarrant County Historical Commission, said that Barker was "quick to recognize the tremendous historical value of the area."

"I think her interest in history is innate," he said, adding "perhaps growing up in the historic part of the South might have helped." Barker is typical of most active historic commission volunteers, Gage said, in that she comes from outside the area.

One of Barker's earliest projects was an effort to organize a complete, accurate, historical survey of the Grapevine area. In the works for several years, the project is now drawing to a close, with the completed survey in the mail.

The Tourist and Convention Bureau of the Grapevine Chamber of Commerce, working with historical society volunteers, planned the survey and hired a San Francisco firm to do the work. Representatives of the firm drove through the streets of Grapevine, Barker said, searching for buildings of architectural significance. A list of addresses, apparent age and architectural features was made, along with photographs.

Barker then researched each building on the list, studying city and school tax rolls for information. An inventory of the buildings was then made, with each building rated for level of significance. After study by the Tourist and Convention Bureau, Barker said, the survey will be made available to the public.

Historical preservation does more than just save old buildings, Barker said. By revitalizing downtown business districts, preservation and restoration can put old buildings back on the tax rolls, she said. Communities would be wise, Barker said, to establish historic zoning ordinances which give short term tax breaks for restoration of historic structures.

Grapevine is in a better position to preserve its history than many communities, Barker pointed out, because of the availability of hotel-

DEE BARKER: PROFILE OF A PRESERVATIONIST

If every community in Texas had a dedicated preservationist with the skills and commitment of Dee (Mrs. Jesse H.) Barker, preservation efforts throughout the state would be remarkable.

Dee is a native of the historic Atlanta, Georgia area and a resident of Colleyville, Texas since the 1960's. In the 1970's she became actively involved in local historical organizations, such as the Northeast Historical Society, which was organized to research and appreciate the history of northeastern Tarrant County. She also became a leader in the Grapevine Historical Society, and spearheaded that organization's successful restoration of the Torian Log Cabin which is located in Grapevine's town square. Her research on authenticity, restoration techniques, and her common-sense approach to the challenges of preservation continued into subsequent projects.

In 1977 Dee Barker was appointed to the Tarrant County Historical Commission, and has been serving the Commission as a liaison person ever since. Dee has initiated dozens of communications with county organizations and individuals on preservation matters. Examples are her relationships with staff persons in Fort Worth's Planning Department, Tarrant County Legal Department, and the North Texas Council of Governments. In advisory capacity, she has graciously responded to numerous requests from Tarrant County Historical Commission Chairman Duane Gage to conduct short-term studies and launch inquiries that have greatly aided the Commission in its program of work.

Dee Barker has spent a great deal of time studying copies of bylaws of various organizations, and has coordinated revisions of bylaws and standing rules for several groups so that they would function more smoothly.

Dee Barker was the Commission's first official representative to the HPCTC, first serving on its Advisory Board. She also served on the Council's committee to select the first Executive Director and she actively participated in the interviewing and selection of the director, a process which took several weeks for conducting interviews and evaluating credentials. Her professional experience in personnel work made her contributions to this matter especially important.

Serving on the Council's Survey Committee, Dee researched bibliographies on literature relating to historical surveys, ordered voluminous data, and corresponded with several firms and individuals for information about appropriate procedures for conducting an historical survey. Her expertise in personnel work also made her participating in preliminary interviewing of representatives of professional firms for the survey project of great value. Then, when the survey actually got under way, she conducted the required historical research on Grapevine's survey practically single-handed. Her liaison with Grapevine's Convention and Visitor's Bureau made the Grapevine survey possible.

motel tax funds. Grapevine receives more revenue from the hotel-motel tax law than most communities its size.

With the survey nearly complete, Barker has moved on to another project. From 1869 to 1886, Barker said, the Masonic Lodge in Grapevine operated the Masonic Institute. It was a private school, operated by a board of trustees who were lodge members, teaching primary through high school level classes. At one time, Barker added, even teacher preparatory courses were offered.

Currently Barker is trying to find a mason who will accompany her to the Grapevine lodge headquarters and verify some facts and figures against lodge minutes. Barker said she has the specific dates needed to check her information.

Barker sees many other projects that need to be researched. "The oldest local history is so recent," she said, "so close to the surface, there for the grabbing." She finds it difficult to understand why more people are not interested in historical research and preservation.

"There are a lot of intelligent, well-educated people in Grapevine," she said "some of whom should be interested."

'Mayor' is bullish on the North Side

By DEBBIE MITCHELL
Star-Telegram Writer

During the last decade, Steve Murrin has cast off his business suits for the jeans of his youth, grown a mustache to rival Pancho Villa's and swapped a successful real-estate company for stock in a few broken down buildings on the North Side.

But not that much about Steve Murrin has changed. He remains the gregarious salesman first and foremost, whether he's hawking the Cowtown Rodeo or his native Fort Worth.

It's that unabashed enthusiasm to promote what he believes in (some call it charisma, others gall) that has won him friends, enemies and acclaim.

Long known unofficially around the North Side as the self-proclaimed "Mayor of Cowtown," Murrin was recognized Friday in Houston by the Texas Tourism Development Agency as the person in the state who best exemplifies the "hospitality for which Texans would like to be known."

The Hospitality Award is one of two presentations made each year by the tourism agency. It has gone to waitresses, hotel clerks and the operator of a wildlife sightseeing service.

In 1974, North Main and Exchange streets were mostly a collection of tattered taverns and topless joints, with the once-vital stockyards becoming less so by the year. A handful of investors surveyed the mess and proclaimed it could be Fort Worth's greatest asset. Murrin wasn't the only person involved in the Stockyards renaissance — he was just the most outspoken.

"There were a lot of background people who believed in going out and doing things and not trying to get their names in the news media," said City Councilman Louis Zapata. "Steve has been kind of a front man for some people, but Steve very definitely has been involved. Because of his perseverance and because of his bullheadedness and not wanting to give up, he has stuck it out where no one wanted to invest any money out here — even to the point where it has hurt him financially and in other ways."

Murrin, 43, said he hasn't been a "front man by choice. I don't have any aspirations to set myself up as a standard bearer. I generally try to wait to see if someone else is going to take a stand on the issue. But it is a fact of matter, you can't wait too long."

He has strong memories of the days his daddy traded cattle on the yards. But he's a relative newcomer to the North Side, an area of Fort Worth more cliquish than the haughtiest social club. His critics accuse him of playing cowboy without the callouses to prove it.

Murrin, the son of an Irish restaurateur-turned-rancher, grew up around horses, cattle and mesquite. Then he went off to Holy Cross College in Massachusetts for two years before coming home to graduate from the University of Texas in Austin.

"But I tell you, there is something that is bothering me," Murrin said in an interview last week before he knew he would receive the tourism award.

"This city really has control over its future. It's a unique, passing situation," Murrin said. "If we don't broaden the base of aware citizens who have the perspective to see some potential adverse direction, then the city will lumber along and grow and increase and get all out of control... Business growth must be on a very select basis and industrial growth must be even more select."

'MAYOR' STEVE MURRIN
... in pre-mustache days

With an almost evangelical zeal, tempered by good-ol'-boy humor, Murrin has made himself the arbiter of select growth on Exchange Avenue. Frequently that has meant butting heads over what people could name their own businesses and alienating more than a few old-timers.

Then there was the Cowtown Coliseum. Murrin leased the 1908 building from the city in 1977. Rumor has it that he did so to keep wrestling from being the facility's main attraction. He and others believed that staging western events at the coliseum was necessary to preserve the neighborhood's authenticity.

Murrin's corporations, Cowtown Inc., which manages the coliseum, and Cowtown Rodeo, which stages the events there, have lost money each year.

"If I wanted to run this place just to make a profit, I could to it, but that's not the idea," Murrin said. "We wanted to build an atmosphere so homogeneous that you felt uncomfortable if you didn't have on a hat and boots. A coliseum is not built to make money, but it does make money for the city in that it brings in a profit atmosphere."

Atmosphere is lost on some at City Hall. Murrin's lease calls for the city to get half of any coliseum profit. To date, that's zero. When his five-year contract expires in 1983, at least one councilman will challenge plans to renew it.

"I think someone should have it that can make some money out of it and give it back to the city," Councilman Dick Newkirk said, adding that he has nothing against Murrin.

Murrin said the city fathers have been hypocritical for some time.

"They'd smile about the Stockyards redevelopment project, but when it came down to the coliseum, they fought for what we had before — which wasn't western events.

"Look, I can live without it if we keep having rodeos and they're good. I don't have to be the rodeo producer," he said. "But the fact of the matter is, it would have been different for better or worse if I hadn't maintained the coliseum in the formative years. It was absolutely critical to prove to the people of Fort Worth that a pure western area could form the base of a new industry.

"I think the world is full of people who would like to come out and take over this place after we've paid all the dues."

Dues have gone hard for Murrin. Two of the buildings he partially owns — the Willis Hotel and the Dixie Club have been vacant for two years. A third, the General Store at Main and Exchange, "has yet to make a profit, but it contributes to the Stockyards." Deed records at the Tarrant County Clerk's Office show he's borrowed heavily

"Let's say I've made some investments the bankers didn't understand at the time," Murrin said. "This is a deal where you put your money in and work like hell without knowing exactly where the return is going to be. I had a banker ask me how long I was going to continue to lose money before I quit. I told him I was going to continue exactly as long as I thought I was right about the area. The minute I found out I was wrong, I'd sell what property it took to pay him back and go back to real estate and make an honest living.

"I've had increasing confidence every year," Murrin said. "Here is an area that was unique in the world. You didn't have to create anything. All you had to do was accentuate the positive and eliminate the negative. And I think we've done that. I damn sure don't claim to have done it by myself, but I damn sure claim to have had a part in it."

Cowtown booster cited for efforts in aiding tourism

By DEBBIE MITCHELL
Star-Telegram Writer

Steve Murrin, the unofficial "mayor of Cowtown" who has been instrumental in the development and promotion of the Fort Worth Stockyards area, was cited Friday by the Texas Tourist Development Agency as the person who best "epitomizes ... Texas' hospitality" to visitors.

Gov. Bill Clements, on hand for the agency's annual awards banquet in Houston, praised Murrin as "an integral part of his state's strong Western heritage" as he presented him with the Hospitality Award.

Murrin, a Fort Worth real estate investor, rancher and rodeo promoter, has been a catalyst for change on the North Side. With his Cowtown Inc. and Cowtown Rodeo corporations, he has been responsible for bringing Western events back to the North Side Coliseum.

He also has been known in tourism circles for his "impromptu hospitality" and for "going the extra mile" to show visitors a good time when they're in Fort Worth, said Paul McCallum, director of tourism development with the Fort Worth Convention and Visitors Bureau.

Murrin's award was one of two traditional awards presented at the banquet. Lloyd Perkins Nolan of Harlingen received the Governor's Tourist Development Award for his creation of the Confederate Air Force. Nolan's collection of flying machines was developed 25 years ago as a tourist attraction in the Rio Grande Valley.

Special citations were presented Friday to Houston television station KTRK-Channel 13, J. Lawrence Sherrin of Rio Grande City, and the Galveston Historical Foundation for contributions to the development of tourism in Texas.

TARRANT COUNTY COURT HOUSE
FORT WORTH, TEXAS

I would like to fill you in on the status of our microcopying project to preserve the rare sources of Tarrant County history. Thus far we have microfilmed the remaining years of the Fort Worth Press, the Commercial Recorder (1930s-1960s), the multi-volume Federal Writers Project, Fort Worth City Directories (1877-1920), the Bohemian Magazine, and several late 19th century-early 20th century volumes on Tarrant County and North Texas history. Copies of the above materials now are preserved and accessible not only to us but to other public libraries and institutions, thanks to the generous donation for funding the project.

At the present time we have $1,251.03 remaining of the donation. A portion of that will be used to pay for a building marker for the Tarrant County Criminal Courts Building. Our next priority is to purchase copies of the Sanborn Insurance maps on Fort Worth and other Tarrant County cities, which I understand are available from the National ARchives. These Sanborn maps are detailed sources of information on structures, their ages, material composition, etc., which should be invaluable in our preservation efforts.

Again, I thank you deeply for making these achievements possible.

Sincerely,

Duane Gage
